For a while it looked as if the Waxman tragedy had united government and opposition and had lowered the level of political tension. The impression was reinforced by the opposition's support of the peace treaty with Jordan, but it was lost in the aftermath of the Tel Aviv massacre. While this column was on its way to the printer, a number of non-confidence motions were being prepared; they will be debated in the Knesset on the eve of the ceremonial signing of the peace treaty with Jordan in the presence of U.S. President Bill Clinton. This Knesset vote will be a stormy test not only of Rabin's political survival, but also of his freedom of action in the weeks ahead.

By not resisting the temptation to use the recent tragedy in its political struggle against the government, the Likud is committing a grave strategic mistake. "This is a time for consolation and piety, Bibi Netanyahu, not a good occasion to promote your political career," warned Ma'ariv columnist Jonathan Gefen. "Nobody will forgive those who seek political dividends as they stand near the remnants of corpses and in the waiting-room of hospitals, and ask to stop the peace process."

And, indeed, during the heated debate in the Knesset on the afternoon of the carnage, some opposition spokesmen declared Rabin's peace policies responsible for the attack, to the sure delight of Hamas.

The second battlefront against the fanatics of Hamas is in the area of Palestinian autonomy, where the PLO's legitimacy as a peace partner will be tested and where Arafat's own future will be decided. In the present squalor of Gaza, no operation against Hamas will succeed, unless it is backed by steady and visible improvement in the miserable environmental and materialistic conditions. Arafat, the reformed terrorist and soon-to-be recipient of the Nobel Peace Prize, faces — not unlike his partners in Israel — similar slander on the part of his accusers.

But, unlike Rabin in Israel, he is in an almost no-win situation. If he does not take on Hamas, he will lose his local standing, forfeit the international aid indispensable to his economy and ultimately lose out politically to Hamas. If he does, he'll be branded as a collaborator with Israel's security groups and endanger what is left of his popularity and possibly his life. Between the two, he will hopefully opt for the second choice and hope to be helped by outside factors, who want the peace process to survive.

At this stage Rabin and Arafat are bound by a fateful embrace, but one that must continue, as there is no way out. The carnage in Tel Aviv was a turning point that cannot be ignored. The rules of the new game are now dictated by their respective opponents. To deviate from the path of the peace process means more bloody strife between their peoples and will also lead to their own political end. If they persevere, they will be assisted by part of the western world and will stand a reasonable chance of succeeding.

In Tel Aviv, at the scene of the carnage, President Ezer Weizmann asked the public to deny victory to the enemies of peace and to support the search for it. Hopefully, Israelis will listen, grit their teeth and continue the uphill struggle for change.

Community needs answers in the Bristow affair

By BERNIE FARBER

As scandals come and go the so-called Grant Bristow affair is a humdinger.

Bristow is alleged to have been a paid informant of Canada's Security and Intelligence Service (CSIS). However, it appears as though the enterprising Bristow may have taken it upon itself not only to spy on the neo-Nazi Heritage Front, but indeed to be involved as one of its "founding fathers," by providing both organizational skills and funding.

The money Bristow reportedly gave to the Heritage Front may have come from payments of up to $60,000 he allegedly received from CSIS as an informant. The substance of such allegations have a potentially serious impact not only for the Canadian community in general, but more specifically for the Jewish community.

Underscoring this sad situation is the way in which the media in general has seized upon the issue as the hot story of the summer. Frequent unsubstantiated reports from questionable unnamed sources made the rounds, resulting in suggestions that Bristow was involved in everything from soup to nuts, and ultimately obscuring the real issues at hand.

While Canadian Jewish Congress strongly supports the CSIS commitment to infiltrate and monitor hate groups, in our view there are a series of specific questions that we believe must be answered as a means by which to re-establish the country's faith in our security service and enable CSIS to get back to the job of protecting Canadian citizens. The questions are simple:

(1) Was Bristow working on behalf of CSIS and if so, when were his services obtained?

(2) Did Bristow in any way help fund and/or organize the neo-Nazi Heritage Front?

(3) Did Bristow, as it is alleged, supply any personal information on Canadian Jewish leadership to white racist organizations in North America?

(4) Did Bristow spy on the Canadian Jewish Congress or the Jewish Students' Network?

It was for this reason that the Canadian Jewish Congress and its president, Irving Abella, asked these rudimentary questions from the very beginning. While other allegations swirling around Bristow's duplicitous relationship with the Reform party and his supposed spying on the CBC and postal employees are important, surely the suggestion that an alleged CSIS employee was involved in bringing potential harm to the Canadian Jewish community and its institutions, as well as anti-racist activities, is scandalous.

As far as the Jewish community is concerned, nothing historically has more power and force than the suggestion that its government may have conspired in some way, shape or form to harm Jewish citizens. The Security Intelligence Review Committee and the parliamentary sub-committee looking into these allegations must come up with answers that are frank, straightforward and honest. Anything less than a full public disclosure will continue to taint the credibility of Canada's spy agency.

Syria key to a comprehensive Mideast settlement

By THOMAS SMERLING

The sweet music of Israeli-Jordanian reconciliation has lulled some observers into thinking that peace with Syria can wait — or be foregone altogether.

Ignoring Syria would be a tragic and dangerous mistake, and Israel and America should resist this temptation. Without Syria, the peace process will remain piecemeal and unstable, whereas a Syrian-Israeli agreement will solidify the other negotiating tracks and perhaps transform the entire region.

The breakthroughs with the PLO and with Jordan left most of the toughest issues to later talks. Jerusalem, final borders, water rights, refugees, economic relations, and Palestinian statehood loom ominously ahead.

Especially with the Palestinians, the road to peace will be long and bumpy, with many detours. The odds of reaching the final destination — real peace with security — will be immeasurably enhanced with the Syrians on board. If neglected, Syria could exacerbate the inevitable difficulties ahead.

Among Israel's neighbors only Syria — not Jordan, and not the Palestinians — poses a strategic military threat. Israel's worst defence nightmare is Syrian armor advancing under a future Iranian nuclear umbrella. Today, Syria keeps its options open with ties to Iran and Hizbollah. It would clearly serve American as well as Israeli interests to draw Syria firmly into the moderate Arab camp, and away from Iran.

Peace with Syria will open the door to peace with Lebanon, bringing calm to Israel's most lethal border. Nearly all 21 members of the Arab League would soon follow suit. Today, many Gulf and North African states are already taking incremental steps toward normalization with Israel, but without a green light from Syria they remain hesitant.

For years Syria has carried the banner of Arab pride, unity and independence. While the Gulf War tattered this flag, it still stirs passions among many Arab constituencies.

It is precisely Syria's weight as the former champion of rejectionism that will make Israeli-Syrian peace ripple so strongly throughout the Arab and Muslim world. Ending the war with Syria will, for practical purposes, end the Arab-Israeli war. The few holdouts, perhaps Iraq, Libya, Sudan and Iran, would be isolated and increasingly irrelevant.

Is Syria ready for peace with Israel? Most analysts agree that Syrian President Hafez al-Assad has made a strategic decision to pursue peace, not out of born-again love of Israel, but from a cold assessment of Syrian national interests in the post-Soviet environment. An astute reader of the political map, Assad wants to mend relations with the West, get on with developing his country, and consolidate his regional leadership.

But the Syrian leader is not desperate. Assad will only conclude a deal on terms he deems honorable. His phrase "the peace of the brave" means never accepting a diktat. It means getting back all of the Golan Heights, negotiating equitable terms, and resisting demands viewed as humiliating. To settle for less would undercut a foundation of his leadership: his reputation as a tough, unbowed defender of Arab rights and Syrian national honor.

For Assad, a peace treaty negotiated from weakness is worse than none. Syrian officials point to Yasser Arafat's humiliation as a negative example. Official posters recently displayed in Damascus say it all: "We have fought honorably, we are negotiating honorably, and we want an honorable peace."

Just as Arabs often fail to understand the depth and sincerity of Israeli security fears, Israelis and Americans often fail to appreciate the importance of honor and respect in Arab politics. Personal honor and avoidance of humiliation often shape Arab positions, just as physical safety and fear of annihilation underlie many Jewish policies. Arab societies have suffered their own historical trauma: nearly 500 years of foreign intrusion, conquest and attempted domination — first by Turkey, then by Europe, and finally, in their eyes, by Israel. History helps explain the emphasis on sovereignty, and why some Arabs worry about Israeli economic domination after peace comes.

Reconciling Syria's understandable concerns about sovereignty and honor with Israel's understandable concerns for fail-safe security and full peace is precisely the challenge facing the negotiators today.

For Israel, warm peace — trade, tourism, open borders, etc. — is less easily reversed and hence safer than cold peace. But Assad is reluctant to offer Rabin warmer relations than Sadat offered Begin. The leap from rejectionism to intimacy is too great. An initially cool peace may later warm up, as is happening now with Egypt.

During Project Nishma's lengthy discussion with Syrian Foreign Minister Al-Sha'ara in Damascus in July, Al-Sha'ara may have hinted at this when asked to describe regional relations after peace: "Heading to better. I can't be as utopian as Foreign Minister Peres...[but] year after year will be better than the previous years."

During the same visit, we also saw signs that the Syrian public is increasingly ready for peace. For several years, the Syrian official press has cited peace as a national goal, and this new attitude has filtered down to the street. Everyone we met in Damascus spoke openly about peace with Israel. Not once did we hear the old rhetoric about the "Zionist entity."

Shopowners and businesspeople spoke of hopes for a "peace dividend" through the reallocation of national resources. Some referred matter-of-factly to future trade with Israel, though they remain skeptical about its scale. Our experience, confirmed by that of other recent visitors, increased our conviction that peace, while difficult, is possible.

The current opening will not last forever. Future governments — in Jerusalem or Damascus — may be unwilling or incapable of forging the consensus necessary for far-reaching compromise. For American diplomats, brokering peace will require a major investment of time in coming months, but a timely investment now will pay long-term dividends in regional stability.

This is the best opportunity ever to end nearly five decades of Israeli-Syrian war, and to launch a new era in the Middle East. Israel and Syria, with U.S. help, should seize it.

Thomas Smerling is Executive Director of Project Nishma, which sponsors programs on security and peace. In July, he led a Jewish leadership mission to Syria, Jordan, Israel and Gaza.

Tragedy and triumph

Israel and its friends mourn the terrorist outrage in the heart of Tel Aviv, the heinous crime perpetrated by Hamas in the name of the Islamic militancy and rejectionism. It's plain that desperate terrorists are out to demolish the edifice of peace that Israel and its Arab neighbors are striving to build. But this has always been their bloody-minded objective. As Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin suggested in the aftermath of the latest tragedy, he will not permit terrorism to deflect Israel from its rightful course. He will not let terrorists dictate Israel's agenda.

Israel's wise, courageous policy has already yielded dramatic and far-reaching results. And this week, Israel and Jordan formally signed a peace treaty, a triumphant event that is both a harbinger of hope and, possibly, a model for Syria — one of the last holdouts — to emulate.

The march toward peace has profoundly affected Syrian Jewry. Last week, Syria's chief rabbi, Avraham Hamra, told a New York City news conference that the emigration of Jews from Syria has, for all intents and purposes, been completed. Since April 1992, when President Hafez al-Assad decreed that members of the Jewish community were at last free to leave for all foreign destinations but Israel, 3,800 out of 4,000 Jews have taken him up on his offer. One-third of the emigrants, including Rabbi Hamra himself, have made aliyah via the United States. And should they so desire, Syria's remaining Jews may also emigrate.

The wholesale departure of Syrian Jewry is a happy event tinged with sorrow. Persecuted and oppressed by a succession of regimes since the late 1940s, Syria's Jews yearned for relief. With the launching of the current Middle East peace process in 1991, they got their opportunity. The Syrian government, acceding to Western pressure, finally sanctioned unfettered emigration. But conversely, the dissolution of this venerable community, coming hot on the heels of the Jewish exodus from Yemen, signifies a broader historic development — the flight of Jews from Arab and Islamic countries since the establishment of Israel in 1948. If this trend continues, Jewish communities in that part of the world may well disappear within about a generation. It will mark the end of an illustrious chapter in Diaspora history.

Dreyfus' monument

This year and next, France and other countries will be commemorating the centennial of the arrest, trial and imprisonment of Alfred Dreyfus, the falsely accused French-Jewish officer who was victimized by anti-Semitism, national chauvinism and the cult of the army.

Dreyfus' name and his eventual exoneration have always symblized the struggle against race and religious hatred as well as the triumph of honesty, decency and the capacity of democratic societies to correct themselves.

One might expect that France is gearing up to commemorate the Dreyfus Affair, and there is no doubt that various constituencies in the country will observe the centennial with the publication of books, museum exhibits, symposia and public lectures.

Surprisingly enough, the Germans have beaten the French to the commemorative wire in a most unique and fascinating way. Berlin and Bonn are vying with each other in the creative arts to reconstruct the Dreyfus saga — through music.

The Deutsche Oper in Berlin has presented Dreyfus: The Affair, an opera by Jost Meier and George R. Whyte, while the Bonn Opera House has featured a new ballet-drama called Dreyfus: J'Accuse, written by Whyte and choreographed by Valery Panof with music by Alfred Schnittke.

The opera, which has received rave reviews from critics, includes a chorus which represents the French rabble singing anti-Semitic ditties and cabaret scenes in which prominent German singers are involved. Dreyfus' voice is also heard as a young boy hauntingly singing a refrain which goes: "Papa, when I grow up I want to be a soldier."

Whyte created the opera with Russian emigre dancer Panof because he felt that words alone could not express the anguish of the victim. The three-hour ballet, with selection from musical compositions by Schnittke, graphically depicts the sequences of Dreyfus' life as it goes from degradation to exoneration.

The Dreyfus affair is the stuff of great art and literature, but it is too soon to say whether it will also become the stuff of great music. However, the German composers, singers and dancers participating in these exciting new projects are certainly aiming at that high purpose.

A $15 MILLION ERROR

I have read and re-read, with incredulity, the front page of the Oct. 6 issue of The CJN. There is a paragraph which is not only mathematically impossible, but leaves one in a state of bewilderment. If Canadian companies exported $116 million in 1992 to Israel and Israel imported over $131 million from Canada in the same period, there must surely be a requirement for a proofreader in the $15 million discrepancy.

I waited, with baited breath, for the advent of a decent spell-checker at your offices and I now sit in eager anticipation of human intervention to prevent a repetition of this ludicrous occurrence. It could be tolerated in an article on page 30-something, but on page one . . . really!

Neil R. Nathan
Toronto

Editor's note: The correct phrasing should have been that in 1992, Canada exported $116 million worth of goods to Israel and imported $131 million worth from Israel in the same year. Incidentally, not even "a decent spell-checker" would have caught that, as it was not a spelling error.

WHO OWNED THE TORAH?

A strange photo appeared on the front page of the Oct. 6 edition of The CJN, showing Arafat unrolling a Sefer Torah to give to Rabin. Equally strange is the lack of any background information to this story. Torahs are revered and held sacred by most Jews. What is the history of this Torah? Where did it come from? How did it get into Arafat's hands? Why is he giving it to Rabin? I asked a prominent rabbi, "If Arafat handles the Torah, does it become Posul (unusable)?" His reply, "only if Rabin touches it."

NOT EXECUTED

I do not expect too much sensitivity to delicate Jewish issues from the general press; but I do expect it from you! Your August 18 edition had an article titled "RCMP seeking witnesses to World War II executions." The word executions is repeated at least twice in the text.

The Concise Oxford gives execution as "infliction of capital punishment. . ." (my emphasis).

The Universal Oxford gives: "execute — to put to death in pursuance of a sentence," and Execution — "infliction of (capital) punishment in pursuit of a judicial sentence."

Clearly, to use the term "execute/executions" implies a crime or crimes, some kind of formal judgement and sentencing beforehand. It also normally deals with individuals or small groups. As we know none of these conditions applied to millions of our brethren in Europe. Not even the Nazis claimed they did.

Thus to use this careless term (as many do) is gratuitously to insult the memory of the martyrs murdered by the Nazis and their collaborators.

They were murdered, shot, killed, slaughtered, exterminated, gassed. They were not executed!

Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress responds: "The text with the word 'executions' was supplied to us from the war crimes unit of the RCMP, and I will draw their attention to this letter.

THE TERRORIST STRATEGY

In spite, or perhaps because of the Sept. 13, 1993 signing of the Declaration of Principles, the Palestinian terrorist attacks have continued unabated, resulting in the Israelis being killed in numbers surpassing substantially those in preceding years. Although Fatah members were also involved in those attacks, the Israeli government repeatedly put the blame on the members of Hamas and [Islamic] Jihad as being opposed to the peace process.

Wouldn't it also be plausible to conclude that if the terrorists were set only to derail the ongoing peace negotiations, they would direct their anger at their leaders as well. Until now, however, no such occurrence has ever been reported.

As I see it, the terrorists' real intent has been to wear down the Israeli government in order to extract more concessions and "good will gestures;" judging from past events such tactics proved to be quite successful.

While there are internecine rivalries in the Palestinian camp, it should be obvious that when the rival parties judge that Israel is vulnerable enough to be attacked, they will join forces to do so, hoping that with external help, always on the ready, they will be again joyously dancing on the roofs.

BREAK THE SILENCE

I feel compelled to write to you as I just returned from Montreal where, with my daughter, I attended the Child Survivors and Hidden Children of the Holocaust conference. I was very surprised by the small number of people attending from Toronto.

It was a remarkably nourishing weekend. We attended workshops, cried, laughed, sang and danced together. Among some excellent opening speeches were those by our own Anita Eckstein, Prof. Irving Abella, and Prof. Robert Krell (from Vancouver).

We hooked up with long lost memories, people who touched our lives at some point long ago. We came away enriched in memories and somewhat relaxed knowing that there is a second generation (600 people attended of which 150 were second generation) ready to carry on our legacy. We are the last generation of witnesses, and we criticized, analyzed, forgave but never, never forgot.

QUEBEC JEWS DO FIT IN

In your issue of Sept. 8 you report that the director-general of the Association of Jewish Day Schools (AJDS), Joe Rabinovitch, stated that the association of AJDS with the Montreal Catholic School Commission, now being negotiated, would "send the message that the Jewish community has a place here in Quebec and wishes to integrate into the society."

Where has Mr. Rabinovitch been these many years? Does the place of the Jewish community in this province, now 200 years old, need restatement? What is this "integration" that he speaks about? Does he see us as an alien group that needs "fitting in" to some Quebec "norm"? Must we aspire to the mystique of "the society" here, whatever that is? Are we not already part of Quebec society?

I believe that we deserve some plain-spoken answers to these questions so that we will know where the AJDS and its spokesman stand.

Time out for Muslim holidays?

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

During these last few weeks the newspapers have been filled with stories about Canadian Muslims. Spearheaded by a group in Ottawa, they are demanding that local school boards give Muslims the same kind of time off that is now being granted to Jews.

The request has thrown the Ottawa School Board into some confusion. After all, some of its members have said, if we grant this to Muslims, then Buddhists, Hindus, Baha'is, Zoroastrians and others will come along and say: "If you do it for them, how about us?"

All this came to a head because in Ottawa, as in most of Canada, the opening of public schools coincided with the two days of Rosh Hashanah, and the Board decided — as did a number of Boards elsewhere — to delay the school opening for two days and make it up later.

Now what kind of attitude should we take in this developing controversy? Since obviously we will not oppose the Muslims, should we support them or sit this one out and keep a cool silence?

Some of our public relations spokespeople have already come forward and supported the Muslim request, especially since it was tied to a suggestion that during the time classes are closed, the schools might have professional development days, so that the children would not lose any instruction.

Rabbi Plaut

Anyone who has an inkling of how we Jews in Canada fought for the recognition of our Holy Days must have compassion for Muslims as well. To be sure, they came to Canada later than most of us did, but then, that was precisely what irked so many Christians: "We have been here," they said, "and have established this country as a basically Christian society, and now you come and try to upset the apple cart and inflict upon us your own peculiar beliefs and ceremonies."

I sat for seven years on the Ontario Human Rights Commission and I remember the fair number of cases that dealt with this problem. The Commission stood invariably with the Jewish applicants (and the Seventh Day Adventists) who wanted to make it possible for those who observed their religion strictly to be able to gain a livelihood in an overwhelmingly gentile environment. It was a long haul, but in the end the rights of Jews and Adventists were acknowledged, and in most public and private bodies around the nation, due attention is paid to their needs. Sometimes it is necessary for Jews to volunteer and work on Christmas and Good Friday, but the legitimacy of their claim is no longer in question. At any rate, that is the principle. It has been a long battle and we have been generally successful at it.

Now come the Muslims and they want the same. In my view there is no question where we must stand. We have to support their request. Individual Muslims, like individual Jews, will have to work out their own religious problems, but whole communities can and must be accommodated by public policy. This applies wherever there are sufficiently large numbers of Muslims to warrant the same kind of treatment that we as Jews in like circumstances have wanted in the past and would want for ourselves now. If we believe in equality, it goes for others just as it goes for us — or it doesn't go at all.

The fact is that we cannot have it both ways: Canada once tried — like Australia — to keep itself isolated and make it a Christian-European colony. The pressure of population movements in the world ultimately thwarted this intent, and a greater sense of human equity began to suffuse the Canadian conscience. We are changing and tomorrow will not look like today. No nation in the world will be exempt from the pressures of migrations that face us today and will face us in increasing measure tomorrow. Our best hope for Canada is to make it fair, decent and honorable. Some old customs and habits — and that includes some public holidays — may have to go by the wayside. But more is at stake. Canada's future will not lie with who works or doesn't work on Good Friday, Yom Kippur or the end of Ramadan. It will lie with the spirit in which we approach these and similar problems and how, with a sense of fairness and equity, we deal with the needs of others.

Sadness and joy in Zimbabwe

By DEBORAH KAZIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Zimbabwean Jews celebrated Simchat Torah this year as they do every year — singing and dancing with the Torah into the night in their modern stone and glass synagogue

But this year, there was sadness mixed with the joy.

The community's only rabbi, Indian-born Rabbi Itzhak Menashe, was leaving the next day to work with 20 Jewish families in the southwest African nation of Namibia.

No replacement for the rabbi has yet been found, and the community is very concerned.

"At the end of the day, only one thing keeps a Jewish community together. We have to have religious leadership. If we don't have spiritual leadership in this country, then the Jewish community will not last," said Stanley Harris, president of the Jewish community in Harare.

Zimbabwe, one of the most advanced African countries, lies just north of South Africa. The country has 80,000 whites, of which 1,000 are Jewish, out of a total population of 12 million.

Two-thirds of the country's Jews live in the capital of Harare, with the rest residing in Zimbabwe's second largest city, Bulawayo.

There is both an Ashkenazic and a Sephardic community here. Ashkenazi Jews have been in Zimbabwe for more than 100 years. World War II brought an influx of Sephardic Jews from the Greek island of Rhodes, where they fled the Nazi occupation.

At its peak in 1960, there were 10,000 Jews here when this was the British colony of Rhodesia. During the war which led to Zimbabwe's independence in 1980, most of the Jews fled the country.

Today, Zimbabwe's small Jewish community is united and committed. It supports a Jewish nursery school, a primary school and a Habonim youth group. Jews here maintain close ties to Israel, where many in the community have relatives.

Harare's Jews, many of whom earn their living from manufacturing fabrics, clothing and furniture, lead privileged lives. But there is a tenuous element to their lifestyles, since the political and economic future of their country is uncertain.

Harare is a modern city, made beautiful by countless Jacaranda trees covered with huge purple flowers that light up the city and carpet its streets with purple.

But outside the capital, people live in desperate conditions in mud huts, lacking proper housing, food and medical care.

As is common throughout Africa, it is estimated that between 30 and 40 percent of the population is infected with the AIDS virus.

Blindness and severe eye diseases are also widespread, and there are only three native ophthalmologists in the whole country.

The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, working along with the local Jewish community and the government of Zimbabwe, has organized an eye clinic in a hospital in the remote northern city of Bindura.

Yair Porges, an Israeli ophthalmologist, runs the clinic, which is the only such facility in a province of more than 1 million people.

"I see a lot of catastrophes that could have been prevented," Porges says, noting that patients often come to him with terrible complications after having sought help from local faith healers.

"The faith healers scratch their eyes with knives and put mud, potatoes and spit in their eyes," said Porges. "They'll put anything in people's eyes."

"To make people see — this is a feeling I cannot describe. This is why I have come," Porges said.

Porges has been in Zimbabwe for a year-and-a-half and will stay for another six months, by which time he hopes to have trained a native Zimbabwean ophthalmologist to take his place.

In the meantime, for Porges and other members of the Jewish community, there is little certainty about what the political future will bring.

The Zimbabwean government is decidedly pro-Palestinian, but in the wake of the signing of the Palestinian self-rule accord last fall in Washington, the country recently established diplomatic ties with Israel.

In the aftermath of the forging of those ties, the Jewish community here is anxiously awaiting the opening of the Israeli Embassy, which is scheduled for next month.

Despite that promising occasion, uncertainty is causing many here, including the leader of the community, to think of moving elsewhere.

"I left in 1978, during the war. I had had enough and decided to take my family and go to Israel," said Harris, who was born in Zimbabwe. "Then in 1980 Zimbabwe became independent, and I am one of those that came back.

"But I will eventually go," Harris added. "My family will go."

Many in the community share their president's thoughts of moving, but they have mixed emotions about the idea.

Zimbabwe is their home — where they were born, raised families and developed businesses. They lead good lives here, and if they can find a rabbi many will see in that good reason to remain.

Modern Chassidic Tales in the old tradition

By ALLAN GOULD

Gaul, as the great Julius Caesar told us in his book on the ancient Roman wars in Europe, was "divided into three parts." (As opposed to gall, or chutzpah, which the Jewish people invented approximately 3,300 years ago, and can be divided into millions of parts.)

Well, the Jews have often seemed to be divided into two parts: Ashkenazim and Sephardim; Dati and Lo-dati, Litvacks and Galitzianers, Rich and Poor. But, most of all, at least back in the 18th century, there were the Chassidim and Mitnagdim.

Now, a humor column is hardly the place to describe the extraordinary tensions, conflicts and even fist-fights between these two central religious divisions in Eastern Europe (on second thought, maybe it is). But imagine my delight when I just happened to come across some Modern Chassidic Tales, written in the glorious tradition of the Baal Shem Tov and Rabbi Nachman of Bratzlav, but with a far more up-to-date flare. See if you find them as moving and poignant as I did.

The Ozarover rebbe once dreamed that he was in Paradise. He looked around and all he saw was men sitting in groups, passionately discussing the Talmud. He then went outside and noticed that his wife was not waiting angrily for him, as she usually did, outside of the Beit Hamidrash. And then he knew that he had truly dreamed of Paradise.

Said the Halifaxer: "What makes a Good Jew? One who does not set fire to his business, even though it has gone to hell in a talliszeckel. One who will give his wife the divorce, even though he swore he would never grant her the pleasure. One who recognizes that his business would never have gone to hell in a talliszeckel, if he had only listened to his wife for a change, and not driven her to want to divorce him."

Two great scholars were arguing over whether it is better to buy Japanese or local cars. One insisted that Canadian cars were far better made, and it was a shanda and a charpa to send our money overseas. The second said that he always purchased Nissan, because they were built for the human race, and he wanted to feel part of that human race. The Montrealer rebbe called them both Fools as he knocked each of them over with his bicycle.

Allan Gould

Rebbe Irving once rebuked a miserly rich man, by pointing out that he never came to shul, he never gave to charity, and that he had been a lousy tailor before he had franchised his crummy tailor shop into 250 stores across North America.

Suddenly, the miserly man wrote out a cheque for $100,000 to Rebbe Irving's yeshivah, and the rebbe solemnly pronounced, "You can always daven at home; there are many worthy tzedakas, and, now that I think of it, the best suit I ever had was one which I had bought retail from you, many years ago. Go in peace."

Said the unemployed but still very bright Oshawa rebbe: "I have five children, and not a single one drops me a card. True, the youngest offered to e-mail me, whatever that is. When I think of my children, I think of all the things which the Holy One, Blessed Be He, has given the Jews over the years: Amalek, Korach, Canaanites, Diabetes. Inarguably, to have had children is a glorious thing. But to be had by your children is another thing entirely. Oy, I could tell you stories."

The Thorncliffe rebbe noted, "He who voluntarily leaves his home and family and wanders through the world living in poverty and self-denial could well be a holy man, but more than likely he is simply trying to escape responsibilities, not to mention 23 overdue credit cards. That's truly what happened to me, when I barely managed to sneak out of Southfield, Michigan in the middle of the night, and no one called me 'holy,' that's for sure. In fact, most of the things they called me at the time you couldn't print in a family newspaper."

It has been said, but far too often.

"Where there is no decency, it is probably afternoon TV."

"Where there are no kindly words, you have been listening to my sister-in-law."

"Where there is no generosity, you must have the same bank manager that I have."

"Where there is no communication, your computer just might have a bug in it that I could easily remove with a program that cost me over $175 but I can let you have for $99."

The Willowdale rebbe declared: "Once I knew a man who had bought a tiny little house for only $23,000, back in 1959. He then went off to Israel and studied the Law for nearly 30 years, before finally returning to his Home and Native Land. Imagine his surprise, when he arrived back in Toronto in 1988, and discovered that his little bungalow could fetch him $400,000! But the man became greedy, and decided to wait until it was worth even more than that. Well, here it is, 1994, and the idiot couldn't get over $250,000 for it, even if he painted it five times with gold. I'm not certain the point of this story, but this real estate market, let me tell you, it could drive you crazy when you think about it."

Rabbi Nachman of Burlington (may he rest in peace), was a long-time smoker of cigarettes. When it was pointed out to him many times by his students that smoking was chillul ha-shem, and that he was killing himself slowly, surely a denial of Holy Law, the rebbe just laughed, between endless coughs and gasping. Finally, three of his favorite students sued the rebbe for over a million dollars each, due to the breathing problems which each had developed while studying with the Great Master. But the rebbe passed away before it could reach the courts, satisfying no one, especially the lawyers on both sides who were licking their chops.

Viennese museum reborn

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

When it opened in the 1890s, it was unique, purportedly the world's first Jewish museum.

The Nazis closed it in 1938 — the year Germany annexed Austria — and dispersed its wealth of Judaica.

In 1990, the museum was reopened as a temporary exhibition in the city's main synagogue.

Clearly, the Jewish Museum is back. And judging by the attendance figures, it is back with a vengeance.

Close to 100,000 visitors from 39 countries have filed through its doors at 11 Dorotheergasse. And Julius Schoeps, its director, is certain that it will take its place as "a real tourist attraction" in a city with no shortage of fascinating historic sites.

Originally known as the Society for the Collection and Preservation of Jewish Art and Historical Monuments, the museum was founded in 1893 by a group of prominent Viennese Jews.

Originally, the collection — which consisted of 400 exhibits and a library — was housed on Rathausstrasse. But after the turn of the century, it moved to rented quarters on the Praterstrasse. It remained there for a number of years, until it found a new home on two floors of a newly-built Jewish school on Malzgasse in the predominantly Jewish Leopoldstadt district.

The Nazi authorities quickly disbanded the museum, moving most of its treasures into the basement of a Jewish seniors' home in Vienna. A few objects were taken to Prague to be displayed at a perverse Nazi exhibition on the "extinct Jewish race."

When Mayor Helmut Zilk of Vienna suggested that the museum be reopened, the response was ambivalent.

One group thought that the funds needed to resuscitate it could be put to better use in expanding Jewish schools and a retirement home.

Another group feared it would degenerate into a memorial for the dead, with too little emphasis on the living.

The impasse was resolved after the municipality partly financed the aforementioned projects and assured the community that the museum would be for "all Austrians."

Initially, the museum was to be located in the Judenplatz. But eventually, a different building was chosen, one that had been in the hands of a public auction house since 1936, and prior to that, the property of a Jewish banking family and an art dealer.

The building was renovated from top to bottom, with costs shared by the city, the federal government and private donors.

Schoeps, a German Jew, hopes the museum will be "a bridge between people." His point is well taken. To some observers, the museum is an apology for centuries of anti-Semitism, Austrian complicity in the Holocaust and the Kurt Waldheim affair.

But, of course, the museum is also a recognition of the role Jews — from Sigmund Freud to Stefan Zweig — have played in Vienna's development as a sophisticated cultural centre. "Without Jewish life, Vienna would not be what it is today," said Zilk at the dedication ceremony. "This museum should be a place of memory, but also a place of education and discussion."

The core of its permanent collection — which will be displayed in its entirety — consists of three parts:

•The first is the Berger collection, which is owned by the city. It is made up of roughly 10,000 items, ranging from religious and ritual objects to paintings, medals and prints.

•The second, the property of the Jewish community, forms the heart and soul of the old Jewish Museum's collection. Apart from ritual objects, there are textiles, documents, busts, drawings, photographs and paintings. The collection is in poor condition and requires massive restoration.

•The third, donated by philanthropist Martin Schlaff, is comprised of 5,000 pieces of anti-Semitica: figurines, household utensils with anti-Jewish motifs, publications, manuscripts, prints, postcards and Nazi propaganda.

The museum kicked off its activities with several exhibitions, all of which have closed:

•This Is Where Teltelbaum Lived was a compressed history of Jewish Vienna, with Vienna's 1938 telephone directory as its departure point.

Torah attachments from the museum's collection

•Gertrud and Otto Natzler: Collaboration/Solitude paid tribute to the Natzlers, who were distinguished ceramic artists.

•David Rubinger — Witness Of An Era showcased the photographs of a Viennese Jew who settled in Israel and whose work appeared in such magazines as Time and Life.

As well, the museum is paying tribute to Joseph Roth (1894-1939), one of the most important Austrian novelists in the interwar period. This exhibition ends on Feb. 12.

A third exhibit, entitled The Jewish Labor Movement Between Zionism and Socialism, starts on Nov. 11, and will last until Jan. 30, 1995.

From The Collection Of The Old Jewish Museum Of Vienna gets under way on Dec. 16 and runs till Feb. 16.

There are also plans to mount an exhibition on Lithuanian Jewry, said Schoeps.

The son of German Jews forced into exile by the Nazis, Schoeps spends 10 days every month in Vienna.

Formerly director of the Salomon Ludwig Steinheim Institute for German-Jewish History at Duisburg University, he is presently head of the Moses Mendelssohn Centre for Jewish Studies at Potsdam University.

He has lectured in Tel Aviv, New York, Seattle, Oxford and Budapest.

At the Jewish Museum, he has a staff of 25, including four curators. His annual budget is $5 million (US).

The museum has a cafe and a book shop. Admission is about $5, but a discount is given to groups, students and senior citizens. Classes accompanied by a teacher are admitted free of charge.

It is open on Sundays to Fridays from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. and on Thursdays from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. There are free guided tours on Thursdays at 7 p.m. and on Sundays at 10:30 a.m., 11:30 a.m., 2 p.m. and 3:30 p.m.

Israel's peace agreement with Jordan, formally signed this week in a Negev desert ceremony attended by U.S. President Bill Clinton, climaxes a year of intense negotiations between the two sides.

Israel and Jordan entered into bilateral talks in October 1991 at the Madrid peace conference. The event was sponsored by the United States and the now-defunct Soviet Union in the wake of Iraq's defeat in the Gulf War. Yet it was not until Israel's startling rapprochement with the PLO in September 1993, culminating in the signing of a Declaration of Principles (DoP) in Washington, that the process really got under way in earnest.

Coming 15 years after Israel's historic accord with Egypt, the Israel-Jordan peace treaty shatters what passes for conventional wisdom in a volatile region.

For decades, pundits assumed that Lebanon, not Jordan, would be the second Arab country to make peace with Israel. No one expected Jordan to take the plunge without Syria's joint participation, or approval.

But these assumptions, however reasonable they seemed several years ago, were thrown to the wind by circumstances which few observers could have envisaged.

Jordan takes the plunge

The Lebanon of old — that pro-Western, Maronite-controlled sanctuary transformed by the destructive 1975-89 civil war — had no intractable quarrels with Israel. The pragmatic Lebanese probably would have settled with the Israelis sooner rather than later were it not for compelling internal and external factors.

But once Lebanon was plunged into internecine strife, with the resultant changes in its political balance of power and the ascendancy of Syria as the final arbiter in Lebanese politics, Beirut bowed out as Israel's second potential partner-in-peace.

Being a Syrian protectorate today, Lebanon is unlikely to negotiate an end to its dispute with Jerusalem until Syria and Israel are on the very brink of initialing a peace agreement.

For years, Jordan refused to recognize Israel. Though theoretically willing, King Hussein was unable to break through the Arab diplomatic boycott of Israel. He subscribed to the hoary tenets of Arab solidarity, which pushed him into the 1967 Six Day War. But most important of all, he did not wish to antagonize his powerful neighbors, notably Syria and Iraq, upon whom he was uncomfortably dependent.

True, he maintained secret, mutually-beneficial ties with Israel. And through thick and thin, he kept the bridges across the Jordan River open. Yet, for all that, he could not permit himself to abolish with the stroke of a pen Jordan's state of war with Israel.

Events in the region, however, contributed to a change of heart on King Hussein's part. The Gulf War, in which he found himself isolated and condemned by both conservative Arab regimes and the United States, once and for all exposed the hollow notion of Arab unity.

The Madrid peace talks, the DoP nearly two years later, the tantalizing promise of debt relief by the Clinton administration, and the pledge by Israel to share water resources and to give up occupied areas provided King Hussein with sufficient impetus to shelve his counter-productive struggle with Israel.

And after Syria — the bastion of Arab nationalism — engaged Israel in serious peace talks, Jordan dropped its heretofore traditional insistence on aligning its policy with Damascus.

The Syrian president, Hafez al-Assad, is not enamored of the peace treaty. As expected, he condemned it. Nevertheless, Jordan has finally and irrevocably embarked on a new path, a course other Arab states are bound to follow, particularly if Israel's arduous negotiations with Syria bear fruit.

With Jordan firmly onside, the often buffeted Mideast peace process has neared the point of no-return. Immense problems remain, mainly pertaining to Syria's ultimate position vis-a-vis a treaty over the Golan Heights, and Israel's calculated risk in expanding the parameters and depth of Palestinian autonomy. But after generations of hostility and warfare, the chances of resolving the Arab-Israeli conflict peacefully have never been better.

Peace process hasn't reached point of no return, says Reshef

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Israel has yet to reach the "point of no return" in its peace negotiations with the Arabs, says the chief spokesman of Peace Now.

"There is still hard work ahead," warned Tzaly Reshef, the co-founder of the organization.

Nevertheless, the 41-year-old peace activist added, "We're moving in the right direction."

Reshef, a Harvard-trained lawyer who lives in Jerusalem, was in town on a 10-day North American tour to address the annual meeting of Canadian Friends of Peace Now.

He was also scheduled to make stops in Montreal and Ottawa.

In an interview, Reshef expressed optimism about the peace process in general, citing major breakthroughs such as Israel's rapprochement with the PLO and Jordan's decision to end its state of war with Israel.

However, he pointed out, several major issues have yet to be resolved before the peace process becomes irreversible.

They are:

- The status of the Golan Heights.
- The matter of Jewish settlements on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.
- The question of Jerusalem.
- The final shape of Israel's agreement with the Palestinians.

With reference to the Golan, Reshef said that only one kind of deal is possible — a full Israeli withdrawal in exchange for a full-fledged peace treaty with Syria.

Reshef, an intelligence officer in the Israel Defence Force reserves, said he expects an accord along these lines within a year.

"There is no other basis for an agreement," he claimed.

But before Israel and Syria can come to terms, he said, they must settle vexing issues pertaining to the demilitarization of the Golan and the possible stationing of an international peacekeeping force there.

Reshef expects a "very serious" domestic battle over the future of the Golan, one in which Peace Now intends to participate.

He is confident that the Labor government will win an absolute majority in a referendum on the issue. Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has promised to call one when Israel and Syria are ready to sign a peace treaty.

A member of the Labor party's Central Policy Commission, Reshef said he doubts whether hard-line rebels within the party who oppose a Golan withdrawal can derail an impending agreement.

Syria's president, Hafez al-Assad, is aware that time is of the essence and that he should reach an accommodation with Rabin before the next Israeli election in 1996.

Reshef urged Assad to come up with confidence-building measures that will assure Israelis that Syria genuinely seeks peace.

Turning to the settlements, Reshef suggested they are incompatible with a peaceful resolution of the Arab-Israeli dispute and, therefore, should not be allowed to impede the march toward peace.

The settlers in the territories who are resettled in Israel should be compensated, he said.

"There is a need to do it now rather than wait until the last minute."

Reshef reported that PLO leader Yasser Arafat, whom he met in Tunis last July, would not object to a few Jewish settlements in the territories.

Reshef criticized Rabin for suggesting that new West Bank housing units be built in Alfei Menashe, just across the Green Line from Kfar Saba. "It sends the wrong signal to the Palestinians."

Peace Now's position on Jerusalem is that it should remain physically undivided and Israel's capital. However, he said, pragmatic arrangements that reflect the national interests of both Israel and the Palestinians should be factored into an accord on Jerusalem.

"It has to be a creative solution."

In the meantime, Peace Now is tring to counter efforts by Jewish settlers to populate Jerusalem's Muslim Quarter and thus change the city's current status quo.

Reshef believes that Israel's agreement with the PLO, which is based on the 1993 Declaration of Principles, will eventually yield a Palestinian state.

"It's not the dream of my life, but it's an arrangement that should be acceptable to Israel. A Palestinian state can't jeopardize Israel's security."

Reshef demanded the elimination of clauses in the PLO's National Covenant calling for Israel's destruction. He said that Arafat intends to amend the National Covenant when the Palestine National Council, the PLO's legislative body, is convened.

Arafat, he went on to say, seems serious about confronting Palestinian radical forces which oppose peace. "But it's not clear whether he can end terrorist activity."

Ultimately, Arafat's success in Gaza and Jericho is dependent on his ability to inject life into its moribund economy and bring down the high unemployment rate.

Reshef ardently believes that Jews in the Diaspora have a right and an obligation to openly express dissenting views of Israeli foreign policy.

"The Diaspora should not be a puppet on a string whose sole task is to send money to Israel.

"Diaspora Jews can't determine Israeli policy, but they should be heard. I'm for democracy and freedom of speech. Israel is strong enough to withstand criticism."

5,000 settlers

Recent Israeli polls suggest that nearly 80 per cent of the settlers would leave peacefully under these circumstances, Reshef stated. Peace Now believes that the compensation bill will cost $2 billion over five years.

Reshef said the 5,000 Jewish settlers in the Gaza Strip, where an autonomous Palestinian entity is emerging, should be evacuted sooner rather than later.

The decision is personal. . .

Synagogue affiliation, plot registration and cemetery management in no way limit the freedom to call any particular funeral home, despite reports of misinformation to the contrary. As everyone should know, the decision regarding burial arrangements belongs exclusively and appropriately to the bereaved family, and to no one outside it.

Within the narrow choice there's a clear and indisputable difference. Every senior director at Benjamin's has a wide advantage in years of experience and training. The ability to explain Jewish laws and traditions in depth, the network of professional relationships to count on in unexpected or personal situations and the supervision over sensitive details continuously justify the high regard for Benjamin's as an institution in this community.

By taking their own decisions in hand, and calling upon Benjamin's, families are indicating an uncompromising degree of quality-consciousness for themselves and the memory of a loved one.

Markham candidates call for responsive government

Municipal Decision '94

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Harvey Goodman

Paul Wizman

MARKHAM — Responsive government, economic restraint and community safety are the main issues for Jewish candidates in the town of Markham.

Bill Fisch, who has been serving as Ward 7 councillor for six years, is running for regional councillor in the Nov. 14 election.

For the past two years, Fisch, 45, has been chair of the Mayor's Task Force on Finance and Taxes. During his tenure, he told The CJN, the town had no tax increase, while at the same time, it reduced costs, maintained service levels and saved money for future capital expenditures.

Bill Fisch

"I want to bring the same concepts to the regional level of government, so the tax level can remain as low as possible," he said.

Fisch is concerned with policing in the town, and would like to see community-based policing, right down to the school level.

Since regional councillors also sit on local council, Fisch says he'll be able to keep an eye on Markham's fiscal matters and try to ensure growth is monitored carefully.

Fisch lists as his accomplishments the resolution of the 14th Ave. and John St.-404 interchange issue, obtaining federal and provincial funding for the GO station and John Street bridge, and helping to complete a feasibility study for the expansion of the Thornhill Community Centre.

High school teacher Harvey Goodman, 50, is seeking election to Fisch's seat in Ward 7, which runs from Highway 404 to Bayview Avenue, and from Steeles to just north of Highway 7.

Goodman's platform includes fiscal responsibilty, improved recreational and summer programs and better police and emergency services.

Goodman says accessibility and accountability are key issues. "Politicians must never lose touch with the voters. I intend to remain sensitive to changing community concerns, whether they are linked to the economy, environment or safety," he told The CJN.

Businessman Paul Wizman, 49, is running for Ward 7 councillor because he's concerned about what he calls the lack of integrity on Markham council.

Dealing with council, he charges, is an "exercuse in futility," as decisions are made behind closed doors and opposition is "stifled."

The vice-president of the Thornlea East Ratepayers Association, Wizman, 45, wants to give ratepayers' groups more weight in the decision-making process. That would be accomplished, he says, by keeping groups more informed about what's going on.

Also runing in Ward 7 are Randy Barber, Tom McKean, Andrew Veltri and Marsha Winton.

The mayoral race in Markham has an added interest for the Jewish community with the candidacy of Don Cousens, a long-term area Tory MPP and a popular figure on the Jewish scene because of his support for Israel, Soviet Jews and the Jewish community in general.

Cousens told The CJN he is concerned about the racial undertones he has detected in the town. He advocates setting up a crime prevention committee, in which representatives of such organizations as Block Parents and Neighborhood Watch would become more involved in monitoring police services and needs.

"We must do more to work together with the police and each other — the community must be safe."

Cousens is also committed to giving value for tax dollars, more open communication and improving transportation.

Incumbent Mayor Frank Scarpitti, a former regional councillor, was appointed by council in 1992 to complete the term of late mayor Tony Roman.

Scarpitti wants to remove the education portion from tax bills to force the province to be more accountable for education expenses.

He says he supports honesty and integrity in municipal government, attracting new business, orderly planning and safe, secure neighborhoods.

Scarpitti is founding chair of the Committee on Race and Ethnocultural Equity of Markham (CREAM), and feels the municipality ought to be more proactive in maintaining good race and religious relations, rather than merely reacting to problems.

As a result of CREAM's activities, Scarpitti said, many of the town staff were given multicultural training.

Running against Scarpitti and Cousens are Marius Frederick and Lindsay King.

Recent census figures give the Jewish population of Markham as 13,075, or 8.5 per cent of the population. That's an increase of 56 per cent since 1981.

Berenbaum prepares to open Holocaust Education Week

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Holocaust has "entered the American mainstream and become enormously significant to the American people," says Michael Berenbaum, director of the United States Holocaust Research Institute of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington.

Berenbaum, who headed up the museum's creative team from 1988 to 1993, will be the opening night speaker for Toronto's 14th annual Holocaust Education Week at 8 p.m. on Nov. 3 at Adath Israel Congregation.

Berenbaum will discuss The North Americanization of the Holocaust, a term he coined in the mid-'80s. It refers to "an attempt to explain the Holocaust in categories, terms and experiences that are comprehensible to North Americans," he said in a recent telephone interview.

"The place from which you remember an event shapes the quality of what is remembered," he explained.

In America, the lessons of the Holocaust reinforce American values such as pluralism, tolerance and democracy, Berenbaum said.

Michael Berenbaum

Lessons learned in Israel would reinforce the necessity for a sovereign Jewish state empowered with an army, he suggested.

The location of the Holocaust museum in the United States capital signifies that the Holocaust "speaks not to the Jewish community alone but to the American people," said Berenbaum.

Sixty-two per cent of the two million people who visited the museum in its first year of operation were non-Jews, he noted. He added that the average visitor spent over 3 1/4 hours, well above the 45 minutes people generally spend at museums.

Attitudes towards the Holocaust have changed since his childhood, Berenbaum said. Born in 1945 to first-generation Americans, he recalls that his teachers in New York yeshivot (day schools) had concentration camp tattoos, but that the subject of the Holocaust was "shrouded in silence."

The atmosphere changed in 1967 just before the Six-Day War, when "we re-experienced the possibility of a Holocaust," Berenbaum said.

Berenbaum, the author of nine books and hundreds of scholarly articles on the Holocaust, feels his work is a combination of "mission and destiny."

Despite the fact that his working life involves "delving into death," Berenbaum is emphatically optimistic. "There has never been a better time in American history to be Jewish," he says. "More interesting, more powerful, poignant, masterful material is being produced. I think we are losing the margins, but those of us who choose to remain Jewish are doing more with our Jewishness, having more meaning, spirit, fun and creativity than ever before."

Senior Care honors volunteers

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A volunteer who has visited the same person for five years, gone on outings with her, exchanged recipes with her and assisted her in making meals, has won a signal honor from Senior Care.

Sandi Ben David was recently presented with the Sam Rotman Humanitarian Award at the annual volunteer recognition night attended by 300. The donor of the award died in March this year.

Though Ben David joined as a volunteer for Meals on Wheels, her ability to help people in a personal way was soon recognized and she joined the visiting program

The Marie and Jack Freedman Memorial Award was given to Larry Schwartz, a member of the Senior Care Board of Diectors for more than 10 years. It was presented by Senior Care president Ruth Margles, a previous recipient of the award.

All the agency's volunteers were honored by the presentation of the Selma Eisen Volunteer Education Award by her son, Elliott Eisen, a board member.

The Board of Directors award went to Mary Ann Freedman, an agency vice-president, while the Administrative Award went to Thelma Herman, and the Clerical Award to Rosa Juscow. Herman, the Meals on Wheels captain, was also hostess for the evening.

Four volunteers who have served 15 years and 12 who celebrated 10 years of service, were also recognized.

Small campuses stay connected

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Following the late-summer firing of 31 Jewish Community Centre employees, one of whom was Michael Goldberg, program coordinator of the Jewish Student Council (JSC), Jewish students at four Toronto campuses initially feared they would be left without support from the Jewish community.

The JSC, which serves Ryerson Polytechnic University, Seneca College, the University of Toronto's Scarborough campus and York University's Glendon College, was until recently a program of the JCC (now the Bathurst Jewish Centre) funded by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

The firing of the 31 staff members was part of a restructuring effort at the JCC.

"We are taking the money that used to go to the JCC and applying it directly to ensure that [the program] continues," said Morris Zbar, director of community planning and allocations and associate director of the Federation.

To that end, the Federation has hired Lois Judelman, 22, a graduate of the Otzma program in Israel which focuses on leadership training and community service, to take Goldberg's place on a contract basis. She is temporarily working out of the Bathurst Jewish Centre, but most of her time is spent on campus, said Zbar.

After Goldberg was fired, student morale went down temporarily. "I felt that we weren't really an important part of the community," said Amanda Sheffield, vice-president of the Seneca JSC, at the time.

"I miss Mike, but I'm glad [that his position has been filled]," said Bernice Mitelman, co-president, Scarborough campus JSC.

Judelman was hired in mid-September, after Goldberg declined to take the contract position, and assumed her responsibilities two weeks later.

"We are still committed to providing services on small campuses," said Zbar. "Those students are isolated."

Toronto's Jewish campus groups are in the midst of a restructuring that is expected to be completed this academic year. Currently the Jewish Student Federation (JSF) at York University, the Jewish Student Union (JSU) at the University of Toronto, and the JSC are separate entities.

Under the new plan being coordinated by the Federation, the three groups will retain their individual structure but will come under the umbrella of a central campus services agency.

Each of the three campus organizations will have its own programming coordinator, while a director of central campus services will oversee all the groups. Rabbi Michael Skobac, currently JSU director, will serve as chaplain for all the campuses.

A budget increase of $140,000 over the current three-campus expenditures of $266,000 is expected to come from increased UJA contributions.

Mirvish urges community to help Jay Feinberg

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Community leaders recently met in Ed Mirvish's office to rally support for Jay Feinberg, the 26-year-old New Jersey man dying of leukemia.

A bone marrow transplant is Feinberg's only chance of survival. He and his mother, Arlene Feinberg, were at Mirvish's office to kick-off a major drive to find a compatible marrow match in Toronto.

"Help stop a death sentence," Mirvish said, urging members of the Jewish community to go for the simple blood test. The best chances of finding a donor are among people of similar ethnic background to Feinberg, a Jew of eastern European descent.

Arlene Perly Rae, the wife of Premier Bob Rae, took her blood test at Mirvish's office. "I'm excited about making the donation that might be the match," she said.

She told reporters that her brother-in-law, David Rae, had undergone a successful bone marrow transplant before dying of other cancer-related complications. Rae was the bone marrow donor for his brother.

Larry Grossman, the former leader of the provincial Conservative Party, and MPP Monte Kwinter also took the blood test in a show of support for the drive.

"Please be my miracle," Feinberg said in a brief speech. "The gift of a stranger can give me the gift of life."

An estimated 45,000 people have been tested in the three years since Feinberg was diagnosed.

While the drive so far has not produced a match for him, it has helped others. Audey Stanleigh, a 19-year-old from Thornhill, recovered from leukemia after receiving a bone marrow transplant from Steven Cheifetz, a Windsor lawyer who had been tested for Feinberg.

Feinberg said he feels gratified that others have benefited from his blood drive. And he's hopeful he too will find a donor. "If I didn't believe I'd find a donor I wouldn't be able to get out of bed in the morning," he said.

"Jay's spirit of hope and courage keeps us going," Arlene Feinberg told The CJN. "He's unbelievable."

And it's that spirit that inspired Lori Palatnik of the Village Shul at Eglinton and Bathurst to organize the Toronto drive. She told The CJN that meeting Feinberg made her want to do something to help him. She's been working steadily for the last six weeks raising $10,000.

But Palatnik said more funds are needed. While Dynacare Laboratories has been providing free blood technicians, each blood sample costs $60 to test.

For information, contact the Friends of Jay Foundation, 102 Ava Road, Toronto, Ont., M6C 1W1, or call 1-800-9MARROW.

Temple Emanu-El gets into mitzvahs

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Temple Emanu-El will be holding a mitzvah-making day for members of the congregation Oct. 30.

Adults, religious school students and their teachers will all be participating in social action workshops.

"Mitzvah making is tied to social action," organizer Martha Rosenberg told The CJN. "The idea of the day is the idea of mitzvah — helping other people."

The workshops are designed to promote understanding of social issues like living with disabilities, family violence, the homeless and AIDS in the Jewish community.

The family violence workshop will include a letter-writing campaign against violence on television, while in the workshop on developing countries, participants will collect old eyeglasses, sewing machines and other items destined for Third World countries.

The goal of social action day is to raise awareness of the plight of people with difficult life circumstances, said Marlyn Horowitz, publicity coordinator of this event. "There are people less fortunate than we are," she said. "We have an obligation to help them."

Involving the children is an important aspect of the mitzvah-making day, Rosenberg said. "We see these things are important to us. We wanted our children to have the opportunity to make a contribution."

Temple Emanu-El Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld told The CJN he's looking forward to the day. The project "represents the diversity of social commitment within a small congregation," he said. Bar and bat mitzvah students are required to do a minimum of 10 weeks of community service.

Number of Jewish candidates vie for Toronto mayoralty

Municipal Decision '94

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto voters who like their mayor with a Jewish tam can choose between three candidates committed to changing the city.

While far behind the three front-runners — city councillor Barbara Hall, businessman Gerry Meinzer and incumbent June Rowlands — in support and visibility, the trio of would-be mayors believe it's time Toronto tried someone new.

Sam Bornstein, 52, is hoping to attract voters with his platform of re-urbanization. He says the city needs to replace existing railway lines with retail and housing developments "to encourage people to work, live and play in the city."

Jenny Friedland

Sam Bornstein

Other mayoral hopefuls are Lorna Houston, Ben Kerr, John Steele, Lill Weeman and perennial candidate Don Andrews, a one-time leader of the white supremacist Western Guard.

In the race for city councillor in Toronto's 16 electoral districts, Ward 14 incumbent Howard Levine is facing two Jewish candidates in a field of four.

The challengers in the ward, which is roughly bounded by Bathurst and Christie streets to the west, the Belt Line to the north and the CPR rail-

Howard Levine

Mona Kornberg

Stanley Taube

The printer and first-time office seeker from Ward 13 is confident the 464,000 registered Toronto voters will respond to his vision. He told The CJN that despite his current occupation, he is encouraging supporters to make their own election signs. "They can etch my name in their [Hallowe'en] pumpkin if they're supporters."

Jenny Friedland, 28, said she is running in the Nov. 14 election "because basically, I'm looking for a job."

A qualified teacher, Friedland wants downtown voters to know that as mayor she would extend public transportation, enforce recycling policies and preserve historic neighborhoods.

The third Jewish mayoral candidate, 37-year-old Bob Hyman, is running on a Natural Law Party platform that includes training 2,000 to 2,500 yogic flyers to reduce crime and ra-way tracks south of St. Clair Avenue, all feel the two-term incumbent is out of touch with his electorate.

They accuse him of arrogance, referring to a heated battle last year in which Levine squared off against ratepayers' groups and voted in favor of a high-density housing development at Bathurst Street and St. Clair Avenue.

Management consultant Mona Kornberg, 51, has lived in the Casa Loma area for more than 25 years and believes the ward's 39,970 residents want a councillor who promotes balanced development.

Kornberg, a former executive member of the Hillcrest Resident and Ratepayers' Association who fought to scale down the Bathurst-St. Clair project, said Levine made a serious mistake when he ignored the protests.

"I am responsive to neighborhood needs," she said in explaining her last-minute entry. "There is a tremendous distrust with the system and with the present incumbent. I am a viable alternative for those voters who don't feel there is anyone to vote for."

Levine was unavailable for comment, although campaign literature provided to The CJN emphasizes his political independence and his commitment to the city.

Forest Hill tax lawyer Stanley Taube, 58, whose right-of-centre platform includes privatization of city services like garbage collection, and a proposed anti-loitering bylaw to promote street safety, agrees that ward residents want a city councillor who listens.

Levine's vote for the now languishing Bathurst-St. Clair project "is not the way a local councillor should represent the residents," Taube said. "I'm offering a different attitude, a respectful attitude, which is different from what they have now."

Taube promises to "bring business principles to city government," and extend garbage collection to new businesses that currently pay for private removal in addition to their city taxes.

Running for school trustee in Ward 15 is Michael Seiden, whose platform rests solely on securing funding for independent and Jewish schools — an issue now before the courts.

The Villas of 760 please meticulous buyers

Today, when making a major purchase such as a home, people choose with an eye to quality and the long term. The Villas of 760 are designed and built to meet the requirements of even the most meticulous buyer. Solid construction, easy maintenance, and the safety, comfort and decorative tastes of the home owner have all been treated as essentials.

There are three models, the Monte Carlo, the Monaco and the Cannes. All are solidly built of clay brick. Soldier coursing, brick arches and keystones give the Villas elegant, dignified exteriors which harmonize with the permanence and solidity of their construction.

Other exterior features include pre-finished maintenance-free aluminum soffit, fascia, eavestrough and downspouts. Every house also has a balcony in front, and an external connection for a gas barbecue.

The front door is fitted with a brass grip set, house number, coach lamp, door bell with electric chime, and deadbolt lock. In addition, it has a rough-in for a security system. There are casement or fixed thermal windows in front, and a pre-cast concrete slab and paved walkway to the entrance.

Every Villa has its own private garage and paved driveway in front. In all models, there is a tap in the garage. The basements, located at street level next the garage, have poured concrete walls; there is a powder room and storage area in each basement, as well as an inside stairway to the main floor.

The elegance and solidity of the exterior is matched within the house. The interior trim features brass finish hardware. There are Series 800 doors in finished areas, and Colonial baseboards with quarter-round in all tiled areas. All the main floor archways are trimmed. For floor areas, the vendor offers a selection of quality 35-ounce broadloom, and a choice of ceramic tile in kitchen, entrance foyer, main bath and powder room.

In the kitchen, there is luminous overhead lighting. For cabinet styles and counter tops, the buyer may select a variety from vendor's samples. The stove area is equipped with an overhead exhaust fan. The sink is double stainless steel, with a single-lever faucet and rough-in plumbing for an automatic dishwasher.

All models have two bathrooms plus a powder room. The vendor offers a selection of ceramic wall bathroom tile, and a choice of vanity cabinets and counter tops to form a pleasing contrast with the fixtures, which are all white.

The vanities have sinks with single-lever taps; also, beside every vanity, there are electrical outlets for small appliances such as razors. Over the mirrors in powder room, main bath and ensuite bath, there is vanity strip lighting.

In the unfinished area of each basement, there is a circuit breaker type electrical panel with 100 amp service, and two outlets under the panel. All wiring is installed in accordance with Ontario Hydro standards, with heavy-duty wiring and receptacles for stoves, refrigerators and dryers. The bedroom light fixtures are in the ceilings. All switches and receptacles are white.

Both safety and energy conservation have influenced the design of the Villas. Safety features include a smoke detector in the upper hallway. Heating and air conditioning are individually controlled; gas and hydro are individually metred.

Each Villa has a mid-efficiency forced air, gas-fired and gas-heated integrated hot water system, and a hot-water tank with a rental contract from Consumer's Gas. The water pipes are copper. There is R19 insulation in the exterior walls, R32 in the roof and R12 in the basement. For convenience, the thermostat is located centrally on the main floor.

The interior walls and trim will be painted with two coats of off-white premium quality latex paint. Except for the kitchen, laundry room, washrooms and basement, all ceilings are stippled in white.

The Villas of 760 are conveniently located on Lawrence Avenue West, just east of Dufferin, a five minute walk from the Lawrence West subway and a short drive to Yorkdale shopping mall. There are schools and synagogues within easy walking distance.

The people who bring you the Villas of 760 have a distinguished history of developing and building quality residences across southern Ontario and the states of Florida and Georgia for over 50 years. In Toronto, major projects include the Sailwinds Condominiums and College Park and the Pavilion.

Construction begins in spring 1995; possession is scheduled for late summer or autumn that year. The prices range from $179,900 to $224,000. Capped-rate mortgage financing is available through the CIBC.

Crackdown urged on hate crimes

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Parliament should make Holocaust-denial a unique criminal offence, in part to offset the damage done by the Supreme Court decision in the case involving neo-Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel, a symposium on hate crimes was told recently.

The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Zundel's "false news" trial has been wrongly interpreted by law enforcement officials, said Mark Sandler, senior legal counsel of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada.

That decision, which struck down the false news law, has "been interpreted [to mean] there is now a licence to deny the Holocaust in a public forum," Sandler said.

Speaking during a three-day Symposium on the Legal Remedies for Hate Crimes, sponsored by the league, Sandler said Zundel should have been charged under the country's anti-hate legislation, which the Supreme Court has upheld.

Looking at proposed government legislation, Sandler said Bill C-41 would direct judges to consider hate motivation in setting sentences. The bill does not create new offences, nor compel judges to set higher sentences for hate-motivated crimes, but it directs judges to see hate as "an aggravating feature" in offences.

Sandler said the league would "like to see sentencing enhancement provisions in the [Criminal Code]," that makes an enhanced prison sentence mandatory, over and above the usual jail term. When the prosecutor shows that a crime is motivated by hate, "the judge should have available an enhanced range of sentences," he said.

By providing a range of sentences, judges would still have their traditional right to exercise their discretion in sentencing, he added.

As the law now stands, a synagogue desecration and an act of simple vandalism like tearing off a car antenna come under the same mischief section of the code. That "undervalues" the seriousness of the hate-motivated offence, Sandler suggested.

Canada should also enact legislation specifically referring to acts like synagogue desecration, he suggested.

In other addresses, Robert Honecker, second assistant prosecutor of Monmouth County, NJ, described the attitude of U.S. courts to hate-motivated crimes. Honecker said the U.S. Supreme Court, in a case involving a municipal ordinance, ruled that a law against public cross-burning was unconstitutional for violating the right to free speech.

And recently, the New Jersey Supreme Court struck down bias charges for painting a swastika and "Hitler rules" on a synagogue and a satanic pentagon on a Roman Catholic church.

American lawmakers are now gearing their statutes towards sentence-enhancement for crimes motivated by hate, he said. Meanwhile, a debate has been raised within legislatures whether to support mandatory penalties. Opponents argue they reduce the judge's discretion, he said.

Greg Fitch, counsel with the B.C. Ministry of the Attorney General outlined the Canadian criminal legislation that has been used against hatemongers.

Nobel Prize winner visits Ottawa

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — This being the season for Nobel Prizes, it's fitting that Ottawa recently hosted a past winner of the prestigious award.

George Charpak, 60, a Jewish French physicist, won the physics prize in 1992. He was invited to Canada by the French embassy and the Chemical Research Institute in Montreal to visit nuclear laboratories and deliver several lectures about his pioneering work.

Charpak was awarded the Nobel Prize for developing a revolutionary particle detector in 1968. Almost every experiment in particle physics since has relied on Charpak's design.

Charpak was born in Poland in 1924, but because life was difficult for Jews, his idealistic young parents packed up their son and in 1926 went to Palestine.

Life in Haifa was not easy, he said. Both parents had manual labor jobs and the family was crushingly poor. After two hard years, Charpak's parents, defeated by the heat, dirt, flies and poverty, returned to Poland and four years later, at his mother's insistence, they moved to France.

By this time Charpak spoke Polish, Yiddish and Arabic. But once in France, he refused to speak anything but French, and demanded his parents do the same.

When the Nazis invaded France, the teenaged Charpak joined the resistance movement. He was arrested by the Nazis in 1943 and sent to Dachau where he stayed until liberation two years later. He was never identified as a Jew; his impeccable French, coupled with his blue eyes, blond hair and 6-foot frame, probably saved his life.

The government of France later awarded Charpak the Military Cross for his role in the resistance movement.

His prize-winning role in physics was solving the problem of mapping fast-moving atomic particles. Early particle detectors capture images of charged particles on film, but the technique was too slow. Charpak invented a simple gas-filled box threaded with wires. When an electric current was passed through the wires, information about the charged gas particles was relayed directly to a computer. It was a thousand times faster than earlier machines and produced much clearer images.

"It was one of the simplest ideas, as all good ideas are," says Madhu Dixit, a physicist at the Centre for Research in Particle Physics at Carleton University.

Carleton was among the first institutions in North America to build the detectors and Charpak made a point of visiting colleagues at the school while he was in Ottawa. He also wanted to see how the university is pursuing another of his interests, adapting particle detectors for medical uses.

Dixit is working on a device, using Charpak's principles, that will produce more precise, error-free mammograms using lower doses of radiation than conventional machines. Charpak himself has developed a wire chamber which is being used in Russia to take X-rays of pregnant women, for whom normal X-ray radiation is a risk.

Ezrath Nashim to add new wing

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yaacov Perez knows first hand what it's like when a parent becomes too sick and frail to care for himself. It happened in his family several years ago when his father's health deteriorated to the point where he couldn't walk around the Israeli apartment he shared with his three sons.

At the time, Perez scrambled to find a home for his father. Now he wishes the geriatric centre in the Ezrath Nashim Sarah Herzog Memorial Hospital had been available.

"I wish I could have sent him to Ezrath Nashim because the services he got don't approach what he would have gotten there," he said.

Perez cites that experience as a personal motivation for his work on behalf of Ezrath Nashim. During his one-month visit to Toronto and Montreal, he has met with potential supporters of the hospital to ask for their help.

Ezrat Nashim is planning to dedicate a new wing in April 1995, at the time of the hospital's 100th birthday. The wing, which will provide geriatric ambulatory services, will include the Silver-Cooper Geriatric Rehabilitation Centre, named after Canadians Lily and Nathan Silver and Florence and Sydney Cooper, who, along with the United Israel Appeal, contributed to its construction.

The rehab centre will provide physical, occupational and speech therapy to the hospital's in-patients, as well as to out-patients from across Jerusalem.

Ezrath Nashim is currently a 300-bed facility, with nearly 100 in-patients in the psychiatric department and 200 in the geriatric department.

Affiliated with the Hebrew University-Hadassah Medical School in Jerusalem, Ezrath Nashim is also a teaching hospital.

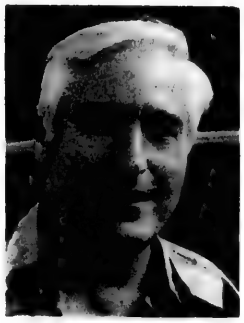
It's name was changed to pay tribute to the late rebbitzen Sarah Herzog, whose 40 years of service included serving as president of the hospital from 1945-79. She was the mother of former Israeli president Chaim Herzog, who is international chair of the hospital's centennial celebration.

Originally dedicated to the care of the mentally ill and the homeless, in the 1970s the hospital opened a department of geriatric medicine. Today, the hospital has become one of the country's most renowned treatment centres.

So far, the former Israel Defence Force officer has made the rounds of tea-parties and one-on-one meetings, explaining all the good work Ezrat Nashim performs in Israel.

But judging by his colorful past, people might be as interested in his own history. Born in Marakesh, Morocco, 56 years ago, Perez was part of the youth aliyah movement that brought thousands of Moroccans to the Jewish state. Perez said he was prompted to make aliyah at age 13 shortly after he and his father were set upon by a gang and beaten up; his bike, a bar mitzvah gift, was stolen.



Yaacov Perez

Perez and his 11-year-old sister moved to Israel. They weren't joined by their parents and four brothers until six years later, something that was fairly typical of the time, he said.

Eventually rising to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the air force, Perez served as chief educator of the Central Command, developing instruction techniques for new recruits. From 1987-90 he served as shaliach for the Jewish National Fund Canada.

Perez has other ties to Canada as well. His brother Avi and sister-in-law Debbie live in Montreal.

Ezrath Nashim has some other substantial Canadian connections:

- The hospital's Albert and Temmy Latner Institute for Social Psychiatry and Psychotherapy publishes papers on trauma, treatment of the religious, and on psychotherapy.
- The Jerusalem Post/David Radler Urgent Care Centre, cares for the immediate needs of the elderly in Jerusalem.
- Prof. Avram Mark Clarfield serves as senior academic physician in the department of geriatric medicine. Clarfield, a native of Toronto, did a family practice residency at Mount Sinai Hospital. He also served as chief of the division of geriatric medicine at McGill University in Montreal.
- Harris Gulko, a former vice-president of JNF Canada who made aliyah, has been appointed international director of the hospital's department of development and public relations.

On Tuesday, Nov. 1, the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Friends of Ezrath Nashim, will host an evening with Dr. Danny Brom, scientific coordinator of the Latner Institute.

Serotta's photo exhibit captures devastation of the Bosnian capital

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's the job of photojournalists to document history. Edward Serotta's pictures record history turned on its head.

One would expect a photo exhibit documenting the deterioration of a Jewish community — in this case, Sarajevo's — to show Jewish infrastructures coming apart at the seams and Jews fleeing the bloody, three-way ethnic fighting.

For the hundreds who have seen Serotta's display in six Canadian cities over the past few weeks, including some 200 last week at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto, the message this time is decidedly different.

The title of the show says it all: Survival in Sarajevo — How a Jewish Community Came to the Aid of its City. Serotta, a thin, intense 45-year-old photographer based in Berlin, has trained his lens on some truly heart-breaking scenes of the devastation that has torn the Bosnian capital apart since it came under siege by Bosnian Serbs two years ago.

There were some 1,200 Jews in Sarajevo before the Bosnian-Serb-Muslim-Croat conflict broke out. According to "official" figures, 1,000 have left, leaving 600 today.

"You can question their math," Serotta told The CJN in an interview, "but not their integrity."

Whatever the numbers, Serotta arrived in Sarajevo after most of the city's Jews were evacuated but was present for the daring bus convoy rescue arranged by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee in February, which eventually took over 200 people to Israel.

Included in that trip was Zeyneba Hardaga, a 77-year-old woman and the first Muslim to be awarded Righteous Among the Nations status by Israel for having hidden a Jewish man during the Nazi occupation of Yugoslavia. Serotta's photo of her does justice to a face that has years of suffering and heroism etched into it.

The photographer, who was born in Savannah, Georgia, spent a total of 33 days in Sarajevo from November 1993 to February of this year, and was given carte blanche to move about freely. In poignant, bitter-sweet photos, he has told the story of a Jewish community that has managed to stay neutral in the ethnic conflict and has taken a leading humanitarian role in the middle of an insane situation.

Serotta has done an admirable job of, according to him, dispelling the myth that the only Jewish heroes are Israelis. The Jewish community of Sarajevo has become one of the leading non-sectarian humanitarian agencies in Bosnia. Serotta's pictures show that for the first time in a modern European war, it is the Jews who are saving and protecting Christians and Muslims.

Sarajevo's Jews have quietly turned their synagogue into a hub of activity, operating under the name La Benevolencija. It employs 54 volunteers, 24 of them Jewish. The rest are Serbs, Muslims and Croats. During the war, they have:

- opened three pharmacies and given away, free, 1.6 million prescriptions, many of them delivered under fire;
- started a first aid clinic that has tended 2,500 patients and made 650 house calls;
- distributed 380 tons of food;
- cooked 110,000 hot meals;
- created their own post office that has handled over 100,000 letters;
- and arranged 11 rescue convoys that sent 2,300 Sarajevans to safety, only half of whom were Jews.

As Serotta puts it: "It's well known in Sarajevo that Jews can get things done."

There's the stark image of a man waiting to leave, dragging his suitcase across the floor of an empty synagogue, and dramatic close-ups of war-weary refugees.

One of the photographer's favorite subjects is Denis Karalic, a 13-year-old Muslim shown working for the Jewish community as a water boy, being treated for a wound received in a mortar attack and finally, crying on a bus en route to Israel.

The exhibit has shown in 30 cities in 11 countries. A collection of the pictures in a book of the same title is sold out. It's little wonder; these are strong images but full of love and even hope.

Retailer accepts clarification on 'Carlos' article

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of Toronto's best-known electronics retail stores is resuming its advertising in NOW magazine after pulling it over a column that seemed to justify the terrorist murder of a pro-Israel supporter.

Bay-Bloor Radio has resumed advertising with NOW after a hiatus of four to five weeks, said Mark Mandlsohn, managing director of the store.

He said the family's decision was made after Mandlsohn was assured by NOW publisher and editor Michael Hollett that the article did not represent the editorial policy of NOW.

The article in question was written by Zuhair Kashmeri, senior editor with the news and entertainment weekly. Titled, Injustice and Holy Terror, it focused on the career of terrorist killer Carlos the Jackal (Illich Ramirez Sanchez).

"What did this Venezuelan do that was more heinous than the U.S. slaughter in Vietnam, Panama and Iraq, and the continuing murder of Arabs by Israel?" the column asked.

"He shot an Englishman, described by the media as 'a Jew' to hint at anti-Semitism. This was the head of Marks and Spencer, an avowed supporter of Israel who gave the country millions in trade. Did this money purchase the arms that killed 20,000 Arabs during Israel's 'ethnocide' in Lebanon? One can't condone the shooting, but try to explain immorality to a Palestinian whose village has been wiped out by Israel."

The article also discounted Carlos' murder of two French intelligence agents who attempted to arrest him. "French agents? Those trained killers who slaughtered hundreds in the Algerian independence war, destabilized Chad and blew up Greenpeace's ship the Rainbow Warrior? I'll save my tears."

After calling for the indictment of Ronald Reagan, George Bush, Yitzhak Rabin, Ariel Sharon, the CIA and the Mossad, Kashmeri states that "compared to these maniacs, I am tempted to annoint Carlos a saint."

In its issue of Oct. 13-19, NOW ran a clarification "of some interpretations of [the] column. . . NOW magazine does not condone the killing of Jews, French citizens or anyone else. We apologize for any misunderstandings this piece may have created."

Hollett told The CJN that NOW ran the clarification because "we were obviously uncomfortable with it [the article].

"Obviously it was a mistake. The paper tries to [express] a broad range of opinions. A line was crossed."

Mandlsohn said the article "was disturbing. It was not a human thing to say. . . The general tone left me with a very bad taste."

The family-run business decided to pull its weekly $1,300 ad. "We didn't threaten them to do this. I simply said I was not comfortable advertising in their paper now," Mandlsohn said.

A sermon by Rabbi Jordan Pearlson of Temple Sinai helped influence him, Mandlsohn said. The sermon suggested Jews should be more active on issues that concern them.

"I think we have to express our feelings," Mandlsohn said. "We did what we felt was right at the time. We didn't do it for the publicity. We did it because we felt it was right to do. It wasn't done to hurt NOW magazine."

Mandlsohn said the store's account with NOW is "a reasonable part of our advertising budget. Our [year-long] contract is about to expire and I don't know if we'll renew it."

Hollett said he shared Mandlsohn's concerns about the column. "I agree with [him] 100 per cent. What troubled Mark Mandlsohn troubled me too.

Asked if the possibility of losing a major advertiser played a part in the decision to run the clarification, Hollett said he and paper co-founder Alice Klein "did not start this newspaper for advertisers to tell us what to write." He said NOW has lost hundreds of thousands of dollars in potential advertising revenue, perhaps millions, because of the editorial stance it has adopted.

"Mark Mandlsohn is not a backseat editor. Although it didn't affect my decision, I listened to him. . . Readers know we write what we believe in."

Bernie Farber, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress said, "I was impressed that NOW took action, but only after Mandlsohn voiced his outrage. The article was appalling. I can't understand how it got by the eyes of any editor in the first place."

Jackie Mason had fans laughing in the aisles on his first professional visit to Israel. Although Mason was undoubtedly funny, for the seasoned fan, the four shows were a bit of a disappointment. Old jokes were shamelessly recycled and the new ones sounded extremely familiar. However, Mason won the day and the Hebrew press gave him rave reviews.

Storytelling Festival launched

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The third annual Jewish Storytelling Festival gets under way this week in Toronto.

An evening of story telling on Saturday Oct. 29 is followed by a full day of storytelling events on Sunday Oct. 30. Two major workshops featuring storytellers Yitzhak Buxbaum and Judith Black are being offered in conjunction with the festival.

The festival is co-sponsored by North York Public Library and Jewish Storytelling Arts (JSA), a non-profit storytelling organization that Leslie Robbins and other Jewish storytellers founded in Toronto three years ago.

"We took a stab in the dark when we put on the first festival," says Robbins, the festival's executive director. "The response was great and people loved it. We got a turnout of about 300 or 400 at the first one, and almost 500 at the second one last year. This year, ticket sales have been going very well."

The Saturday night gala storytelling concert, which takes place at the North York Performing Arts Centre, features American raconteurs Yitzhak Buxbaum, author of Storytelling and Spirituality in Judaism, and Judith Black, a Bostonian who has performed widely across North America. Tickets are $15.

Famous kugel story

Sunday's program at the Barbara Frum Library at 20 Covington Rd. involves several lectures and workshops during the day and an evening cabaret featuring lighthearted tales and the music of Brian Katz, Alan Merovitz and the Narayever Singers. An all-day adult pass is $25.

The Sunday evening cabaret also features other storytellers including Michael Wex, who according to Robbins will tell his famous kugel story. "This is a story of a reincarnated potato kugel," she says.

Buxbaum is giving a workshop, entitled Storytelling and Spirituality, scheduled to begin on Thursday evening, Oct. 27 and conclude on Friday, Oct. 28. Judith Black's workshop, Creating Your Own Personal Stories, runs from Monday, Oct. 31 to Wednesday, Nov. 2.

BOOKS

By BERNARD BASKIN

No Ordinary Time: Franklin & Eleanor Roosevelt: The Home Front in World War II by Doris Kearns Goodwin, Simon & Shuster $30.00 (US)

Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt were extraordinary characters who bent and shaped the course of modern history. This book is their dual portrait — against the background of the event-filled war years, 1940 through 1945.

Elected to an unprecedented third term, the president cajoled an isolationist, Depression-ridden nation into supplying arms to England in her struggle against the Nazis. After the shock of Pearl Harbor, he skilfully guided his countrymen in creating a formidable fighting force and in transforming America into a mighty industrial power.

Throughout the 1930s, as thousands of Jews fled Nazi Germany, the United States narrowly opened its doors to accept them. The number who were granted refugee status was pitifully small compared with the number desperately seeking haven. In the years between 1933 and 1940, about 100,000 refugees were admitted.

Roosevelt was not unsympathetic to the plight of the refugees, but he had to face the fiercely xenophobic and anti-Semitic mood of the country. Polls confirmed that the majority of Americans were unwilling to assist Jews, especially if it meant more immigration into the United States. It is well to remember that though Jews were only three per cent of the U.S. population, they represented nearly 15 per cent of Roosevelt's top appointments. Indeed so prominent were Jews in the Roosevelt administration that bigots routinely referred to the New Deal as the Jew Deal and charged that Roosevelt was himself a Jew."

In 1940, when Germany was still willing to grant exit permits to Jews, Roosevelt remained cautious. He was warned by anti-Semitic members of the State Department that the Nazis were using immigration as a means of infiltrating their agents into the United States.

Eleanor fought tooth and nail for a more relaxed and humane policy. She managed to rescue 83 Jewish refugees who had sailed to America aboard a Portuguese vessle. But her efforts met with apathy or disapproval. Goodwin writes, "Eleanor's failure to force her husband to admit more refugees remained, her son James, later said, 'her deepest regret at the end of her life.' "

In 1942, when Roosevelt requested a war-powers bill that would have given him the power to open the gate to wider immigration, the bill was crushed in Congress by a powerful conservative coalition. That week, Goebbels remarked in his diary, "At bottom, I believe both the English and the Americans are happy that we are exterminating the Jewish riff-raff."

In 1944, the president finally created the War Refugee Board that saved untold thousands of lives. Roosevelt believed that the best way to save Europe's Jews was to win the war, but his intensity of focus blinded him to a series of smaller steps that could have been taken, such as applying more pressure in Germany to release Jews and more pressure on neutral countries to take them in. Moreover, the United States Air Force could have bombed the train tracks to Auschwitz, and even the concentration camps themselves.

The author, in this work of prodigious research, has made use of both oral and archival sources. She skilfully threads her way back and forth between the personal lives of the president and members of his family and friends, and the signal and dramatic events of the war.

Roosevelt's death in 1945 left the nation grief stricken. Eleanor continued her work on behalf of many causes for the remaining 17 years of her life.

BILL GLADSTONE'S

EYE ON ARTS

Humanity's future: will it be "earthbound" or "spacebound"?

My uncle, the artist Gerald Gladstone, posed this question to me recently outside Yorkdale shopping centre in North York. We were standing in the parking lot near The Bay, beside one of his major works, a bronze colossus called Universal Man, which was installed there in late September. He seemed pleased that people were stopping to look at the sculpture and read the plaque; some were even sitting on the pedestrian-friendly platform.

Universal Man stands more than 21 feet high and weighs some 6,000 pounds; it is hard not to notice. Its feet, in a manner of speaking, are made of clay; its legs are thick and rolling, like mountains; the organic lines of a prototypical Canadian landscape may be detected in its midriff; and the billowing imagery of clouds is visible in its upper body. The figure's arm is outstretched to heaven; in its hand is a sphere. According to its creator, Universal Man symbolizes "earthbound human energies reaching towards a higher universal knowledge."

Despite its considerable girth (and its considerable worth, now estimated at more than $1 million), Universal Man was summarily toppled from its previous location beside the CN Tower, where it had stood since 1976, when construction began on SkyDome in 1987. The piece, Gladstone notes, "already has a history."

Born into a working-class family in Toronto in 1929, Gladstone began painting at age 15. One of a group of eminent artists that emerged here in the 1950s (others included Harold Town and Michael Snow), he had a successful one-man show in New York in 1963 and returned home a recognized artist. His public works since then have included the Three Graces sculpture and fountain at Bay and Wellesley, Toronto; the McGillivray fountain at the CNE, Toronto; a sculpture and fountain for Place Ville Marie, Montreal; the Martin Luther King Memorial in California; and many other works across Canada and internationally.

Like the Universal Man, Gladstone's feet seem firmly planted on the ground, his head in the clouds. This came across very well when I asked him to tell me more about the sculpture that stood before us so dramatically against the afternoon sky. Instead of a down-to-earth physical description involving design, form and matter, he responded with some lofty ideas on the future of civilization.

"I don't know whether our species is about to face an imminent set of decisions," he said. "Are we going to relate to the planet in future, or are we going to relate to a space environment? Will we abandon the planet as a viable nest, even though it is a spaceship of the highest calibre and contains answers to all the best questions we can ask?"

This dichotomy — earthbound and spacebound — is an important key to Gladstone's art. His "earthbound" pieces feature the organic, sensuous curves of earth: women, men, landscapes, skyscapes. In these works, one can see the influence of his friend and mentor, the late British sculptor Henry Moore.

Alternately, his "spacebound" pieces offer random slices of the perfect geometry of the universe: straight lines, cones, spheres, parabolic curves, nuclear configurations, intricate abstract spatial interrelationships. In these works, one sees affinities to the art of the late Buckminster Fuller, another friend and influence of Gladstone's. The artist says he has also been shaped by a school of abstract expressionists that emerged in New York after 1945, whose ranks include Mark Rothko, Arshile Gorky and Willem de Kooning.

In his earlier days, Gladstone worked at the same engraving house where several painters of the Group of Seven were apprenticed. Like them, he is aware of the overriding importance of the landscape as a tradition in Canadian art.

"Canadian artists are plagued and blessed with this tradition," he said. "It gives them a safe launching pad for their ideas but it can also trap them into not experimenting with newer forms." He said that he has distilled the organic curves and lines of the landscape for use in other forms, such as Universal Man.

Art, according to Gladstone, is an essential part of the process of how humankind gains knowledge. Even the primitive cave painters, he said, were doing far more than just beautifying their homes. Rather, they were attempting to gain mastery over the wild and ferocious animals whose images they captured so well in muddy ochre on their walls. Our discussion served as an important reminder to me that good art is more than society's window-dressing, more than mere decoration. Rooted in the soil, it reaches for the stars.

Film targets lethal viruses

TORONTO — The creators of Deadly Currents, the award-winning documentary on Middle East tensions, have produced a startling new film on lethal viruses.

Co-produced by Simcha Jacobivici and Toronto's Elliott Halpern, who also directed and wrote the film, The Plague Monkeys is touted as the first documentary to explore so-called filoviruses, the most dangerous viral strain facing humanity.

The Plague Monkeys will air on CBC television on Nov. 1 at 9 p.m.

The hour-long film covers the first filovirus outbreak in Germany in 1967, the second in Zaire in 1976 and the 1989 outbreak in Reston, Virginia, where it was carried by 100 monkeys imported for laboratory experiments. To avoid mass panic, the public was never informed.

The deadly and stealthy filoviruses are being called the "21st century's plague," capable of wiping out millions in a matter of weeks.

Israeli persecution called a myth

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Widely-reported claims by immigrants from the former Soviet Union of religious persecution in Israel are largely a myth, says a leading Israeli lawyer and judge.

Jonathan Livny says that of the "thousands" of cases he's handled — the vast majority dealing with emigres from the former Soviet Union — "never once" has he encountered a legitimate claim of persecution based on religious status.

And overall, "only a very small minority" of former Soviets claim religious persecution in Israel, Livny stressed.

Livny, in town last week for a series of speaking engagements for United Jewish Appeal, was one of three experts who appeared before Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) in Montreal in August. The day-long hearing had been called after an angry diplomatic flap occurred between Canada and Israel over Ottawa's controversial policy of accepting Israeli citizens as refugees.

Canada has granted refugee status to over 300 claimants from Israel since 1992. Almost all of them were originally from the former Soviet Union, but were granted Israeli citizenship under the Law of Return upon arrival in the Jewish state.

Roughly 2,000 Israelis are now in Canada seeking refugee status. In fact, Israel is now a major source of refugee claimants here. The vast majority are said to be former Soviets; often they are mixed-faith couples.

Many claimants here allege beatings by Israeli police, threats, harassment, mistreatment of children in schools, rape and state-sanctioned persecution because of mixed marriages or questionable status as Jews.

Jonathan Livny

Livny told The CJN that only 30 per cent of all immigrants to Israel from the former Soviet Union — roughly 150,000 people — fall under the category of "half-Jews" or "non-Jews."

"Half-Jews" have non-Jewish mothers, while "non-Jews" have non-Jewish parents but at least one Jewish grandparent, Livny explained. Nevertheless, the Law of Return requires proof of just one Jewish grandparent for the granting of Israeli citizenship.

Livny, who operates a legal clinic for Jews from the former Soviet Union, says emigres' complaints tend to focus on sexual harassment, unfair treatment from landlords and wrongful dismissal from jobs. "But I have never once had a claim that someone was persecuted because they were a non-Jew."

Those now in Canada waiting for refugee status have "tailored" their stories to fit Canadian criteria, he said.

Areas in which former Soviets do suffer, Livny said, are in marriage and burial. Civil marriages are not conducted in Israel; Conservative and Reform marriages are not recognized. Those not of Orthodox background often have no choice but to have civil weddings in Cyprus, at prohibitive cost.

Burial "is a terrible situation" for former Soviets because thousands of them cannot be interred in Jewish cemeteries. "That means many older people will not get a Jewish burial in the Jewish state," Livny said.

A recent Supreme Court ruling allowed non-Orthodox burials but there is still no land set aside, he added.

Reform conversions, however, "have a good chance of being recognized."

Livny said he hopes the outcome of the Canada-Israel flap will be that Ottawa "will want to admit people with skills and training and not on the [false] basis that they are being persecuted by the state."

A major fear he has is that one day, the Knesset will pass laws which will override court rulings.

Livny, a former attorney-general for the West Bank, also sits once a week as a judge on the military court in the territory. Today, he noted, 95 per cent of cases before him involve members of Hamas, whereas a few years ago, they involved membership in the PLO.

Despite the accord with the PLO, there is much more violence and fanaticism today in Judea and Samaria than a year ago, he said.

Jewish Agency's importance cited

TORONTO — The chair of the UJA-financed Jewish Agency, Mendel Kaplan, is busy these days explaining to the Jewish world why a prosperous Israel still needs Diaspora support.

The Agency oversees the rescue and resettlement in Israel of Jews from distressed countries and funds hundreds of social welfare projects.

"It has nothing to do with the wealth, status and comfort of Israel," he said. "Israel is the centre of the Jewish people. We are a people dispersed throughout the world for which Israel is responsible and we are responsible to Israel."

Kaplan called contributing to Israel through UJA more than an act of charity or philanthropy. "It's a holy task, a just task," he declared.

This summer, Israel's Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin suggested disbanding the Jewish Agency because Israel no longer required contributions from outside Jewish communities.

But Kaplan detailed how Agency-supported relief and rescue efforts for Sarajevo's Jewish community also benefited non-Jewish residents of the city. Israel absorbed Muslim immigrants along with thousands of Jews.

Toronto's UJA canvassers have completed 20 per cent more cards than last year, and the 1995 contribution total is keeping pace with 1994.

Jewish Museum of Western Canada planned for Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Museum of Western Canada will be part of the future Jewish Community Campus of Winnipeg.

The organization's first public event was a press conference held on the campus's south Winnipeg site on Oct. 13, to announce the establishment of the museum.

The museum is a joint effort of all the Jewish historical societies and communities of Western Canada, according to Harry Gutkin, president of the Winnipeg-based Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada and chair of the steering committee that created the museum.

"We discussed the concept with delegates from across the west at a conference in Winnipeg on April 24," Gutkin said. "Everyone endorsed the proposal and followed up with written letters of support from their regions."

Gutkin described the museum as an important tool for teaching younger Jews about the rich history of Jewish life in Western Canada over the past 150 years, as well as a bridge for other cultures in promoting tolerance and harmony for all Canadians.

The museum will house three permanent galleries: one depicting the history of Jewish life in Western Canada; an interactive Discovery Gallery which will present Jewish customs, music and folklore; and a Holocaust Gallery. There will also be changing displays and exhibits, a library, classrooms, a theatre, climate controlled archives, a lecture hall and a gift shop.

The museum is expected to open by the end of 1996.

Gutkin thanked the federal and provincial governments for their support.

In his remarks, Lloyd Axworthy, minister of Western Economic Diversification Canada, reported that his department is contributing $3.65 million towards the museum's construction, under a program for adapting Western Canadian historic centres such as the Fort Osborne Barracks (where the campus is to be erected) for modern usage.

Speaking for the Manitoba government — which is contributing $1 million to the project — Harold Gilleshammer, minister of culture, heritage and citizenship, spoke of the "rich heritage, skills and knowledge with which the Jewish people have helped build this country." He also spoke of the rejuvenation of the old barracks and its role as a symbol of the past.

The $26-million Jewish Community Campus will also house the YMHA Jewish Community Centre, Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate — the Jewish high school now located in north Winnipeg, the Ramah (elementary) Hebrew School, and various communal offices.

Sheldon Berney, board president, Jewish Community Campus of Winnipeg and master of ceremonies at the press conference, reported that the fundraising and design for the campus were going well and that plans are being made to hold the groundbreaking ceremony in the spring.

Bonds, shul fetes Feldbergs

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "We were the refugee kids who came to Canada with nothing and now we're helping others to realize their dreams."

That was the simple and soft-spoken response by Saul Feldberg to the honor accorded to him and his wife, Toby, for their contributions to Israel.

"We arrived here with nothing, but Canada gave us a new lease on life. It is possible with hard work to achieve the impossible," Feldberg said.

He and his wife run Global Upholstery, Canada's largest manufacturer of office furniture. They also established Teknion Industries in Haifa, which exports furniture to Europe and employs 250, including 150 new Soviet immigrants.

The Feldbergs were recently honored by State of Israel Bonds and Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue at a cabaret dinner, attended by 350, at which the renowned entertainer Mike Burstyn gave a brilliant performance.

Feldberg's mother, Eva Feldberg, was one of the guests, as were their four children, David, Bernie, Janice and Joel, and two grandchildren, Jordy and Alex Feldberg. Sam Crystal chaired the evening.

"I'm happy to be associated with Israel Bonds. The money from Bond sales is helping the security of Jews and helping to attain peace," said Art Eggleton, president of the federal Treasury Board and MP for York Centre, the riding in which the synagogue is located.

"This is the 20th year that Beth Emeth has bought a million dollar Israel Bond and no other synagogue has done that," Eggleton said. "This is a great contribution to Canada and Israel."

To help build Israel's economy, every Jew in the Diaspora should buy a minimum of $250 in Israel Bonds, said Alex Grossman, chair of Canada Israel Securities, stating the gist of a message given to him recently by Israel's finance minister.

"We need millions of Bond buyers, including non-Jews, from all over the world. Investing in Israel is good business for Jew and Gentile alike," Grossman said.

A large serigraph, Star of Peace, by an Israeli artist, was presented to the Feldbergs by Beth Emeth's Rabbi Joseph Kelman.

Israel was likened "to a mother with outstretched arms waiting to rescue Jews from around the world" by Feldberg, who lived in Israel for some years, working on a kibbutz. He paid tribute to Israel's record in absorbing so many Jews from the former Soviet Union.

'Proud of warm relationship'

"I am proud of the warm relationship between Canada and Israel, and of Canada's support for the peace process."

Feldberg said he was a product of the Holocaust. "As children we lived through World War II, our only crime being that we were Jews." He said he has always purchased Israel Bonds and visits the country every year.

In fact, Feldberg is leading a tour of Israel in July 1995 of 650 dealers and associates of his firm. "It will be the trip of a lifetime."

By the end of the century, Israel will need $10 billion for infrastructure, 40 per cent of it being the responsibility of Israel alone, Crystal said. Canada is being counted on to buy $100 million in Bonds this year, he said, noting that Israel Bonds are RSP-approved and yield as high as eight per cent interest on some issues. Israel has never defaulted on the capital or interest on Bonds and 100 per cent of every dollar goes to Israel.

Others taking part in the program were Gord Garshowitz, president, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, Rabbi Barry Schneider, Cantor Louis Danto and Hank Rosenbaum, who with Max Guttman, was dinner co-chair. A special presentation was made to Bernice Levine, executive director of the synagogue and Aubie Himmel, who with Al LaPorter, is the synagogue's Israel Bond co-chair.

Canadian Palestinian leader visits Mississauga synagogue

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

MISSISSAUGA — Solel Congregation set a precedent recently by hosting a representative of Palestine House as guest speaker following Friday evening services.

"It made sense to do something locally," said Rabbi Lawrence Englander, spiritual leader of the congregation.

Palestine House and Solel are located about five blocks apart. The former was established two years ago as the umbrella for five Palestinian organizations; the latter is Mississauga's only synagogue, with about 280 member families.

The evening program, which was co-sponsored by B'nai Brith's 50-member Halton-Peel lodge, was initiated by Rabbi Englander. Shortly after the High Holidays, the rabbi invited Rashad Saleh, president of Palestine House, to speak at Solel.

"He was very amenable," recalls Rabbi Englander.

Before reading the 15-minute speech Saleh had prepared, Hazineh made a few personal comments, recalling his childhood in 1960s Jerusalem, where he used to turn off the synagogue lights for his Jewish neighbors on Friday nights.

About 120 people came to hear Saleh's speech, which dealt with the Canadian Palestinian community as well as the Middle East peace process.

The Palestinian Canadian community comprises some 18,000 people, said Hazineh. Over half of them live in Metro Toronto, including almost 6,000 in the Mississauga area.

Palestine House was described as "an educational, cultural and social centre" and "the spokesbody of the Palestinian community in Canada."

Contacts have been established between Palestine House and organizations such as Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith and the New Israel Fund, Hazineh said.

According to Saleh's speech, Israel must meet certain conditions in order for the peace process to work. Among them are "the dismantling of all controversial settlements" and the "taking into consideration the right...to [Palestinian] self-determination and the creation of an independent Palestinian state."

Hazineh told The CJN in a telephone interview that Palestinians want to see "tangible change in their lives," both economically and in terms of personal welfare, in the near future. "That's the only way they would support this process," he said.

Saleh, in his speech, accused Israel of "dragging its feet in terms of implementing the Accord."

The speech concluded on an optimistic note. "I think peace between both communities is attainable. We have an opportunity to work with moderates on both sides. Let's use it and not lose it."

Hazineh is also an optimist, he said. He believes "sitting down together" is the only way to reach compromise, and has been involved in Jewish-Palestinian dialogue in Toronto for close to 10 years (with the exception of a three-year period after the beginning of the Intifadah, when the dialogues stopped).

Hazineh said he felt very comfortable at Solel. Although some people in the all-Jewish audience asked pointed questions which challenged remarks from the speech, the majority wanted information and clarification, Hazineh said.

"The major objective, of getting to know each other better, was achieved. I thought it was a very worthwhile evening," said Rabbi Englander.

Joyce Aster, field co-ordinator for B'nai Brith's Halton-Peel office, termed the program "a very important first step."

"We're hoping it will open the door to other opportunities. We're looking forward to a reciprocal gesture," said the rabbi.

Paradise Lost should have been

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Paradise Lost by Clifford Odets opened at New York's Long Acre Theatre in 1935, it was panned by the same critics who liked Odets' other plays produced that year, Waiting for Lefty and Awake and Sing.

Time has not been kind to Paradise Lost. A production of the play, 59 years later in Toronto, by Equity Showcase, which ended Oct. 22, failed to reveal any redeeming qualities. It was a windy, unfocused play in 1935, it still is today.

The one positive note is that it enabled 20 actors and a production crew of 17 to gain the experience of staging a difficult play at Harborfront's Studio Theatre, even, if, under Equity Showcase rules, they are not paid. At their pay-what-you-can performances, the cash helped to meet production costs.

A program note by director Natasha Bloomberg says Paradise Lost is relevant today because economic recession has raised the same questions for society as the Great Depression did in the 1930s. Well, the world is far different today, and if Odets' preaching didn't sound valid in 1935, it is even hollower now.

It is asking a lot from actors to overcome a poor script, and in this case they weren't helped by a somewhat rambling direction that didn't promote interaction among cast members.

For instance, one of the central characters, household head Leo Gordon, played by Steve Behal, who wanted a better world, seemed to be out in left field most of the time, never fully engaged with the chronic problems of his three children, Julie, Ben and Pearl.

Richler pulls no punches at Festival of Authors

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Several hours before he gave a reading from his latest book, This Year In Jerusalem, at the Harbourfront International Festival of Authors, Mordecai Richler participated in a public question-and-answer session.

His answers to questions on Quebec, Israel, aliyah, the Montreal exodus and other subjects showed that the Montreal writer has lost none of his provocative style.

Was he offended that Yasser Arafat was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize? Hardly, he responded. "Menachem Begin was a terrorist, too, and so was (Yitzhak) Shamir. So it didn't offend me. What worries me is whether Arafat is capable of carrying out his part of the deal or not."

He summed up the Arab-Israeli conflict as "two wrongs confronting each other."

Commenting on Israel's religious fundamentalist parties, Richler said, "They differ from Muslim fundamentalists in that they're not as violent — although someone did shoot 33 people in a mosque. But that's rare."

The session was moderated by former Liberal party strategist Jim Coutts, who asked several pertinent questions to get the ball rolling before the audience joined in. Noting that Richler has indiscriminately provoked English Canada, French Canada, and now Israelis, Coutts asked whether he purposely tries to be provocative "just to have fun."

"Israelis are much more tolerant of criticism than North American Jews," Richler replied. "My books have always done very well in Hebrew translation. People on the left appreciate it when writers are more critical of the government.

"I write about things as I see them. I don't try to be provocative. Some people take offense, but I'm not running for office. I'm just trying to be a witness."

Richler was careful to make clear that he represents only himself. "I don't presume to speak for any community or to be anyone's spokesman. I'm a community of one. I think my function is to be an honest witness of the times. A writer shouldn't be confused with the Anti-Defamation League or the Red Cross."

The celebrated author of The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, St. Urbain's Horseman and other novels about Montreal Jews, Richler and his family lived in England for about 20 years before returning to Canada in 1972.

"I never had any doubt that I was a Canadian, even when I lived abroad," he said. "I couldn't write a novel about England because I was never brought up there... A writer needs to know the price of a haircut and who the folk heroes are in a place."

Asked how he could write about Israel if he identifies as a Canadian, he responded, "I can identify with Israelis because I'm Jewish, and with the Zionists because I was one. But I can't present them with a program, because that would be pompous."

Numerous questions dealt with Quebec politics, and one specifically about the situation of anglophone Jews living in Montreal.

"It's a very troubling situation," he said. "A lot of young anglophones, Jews and WASPs, are leaving because they can't take the hassle. It's a great loss to Montreal, and the economy is suffering because of it. If I were 25 or 30, I don't know if I'd put down roots there or buy a house there, which is a sad thing to say."

Richler said that Canada was an "empty" country that "could do with a lot more immigrants," and noted that immigrants presently account for about 40 per cent of Canada's population.

"Fifteen years from now, [immigrants] will be the majority, and they will be very impatient about this quarrel between the two founding species, the French and the English."

He agreed with one questioner that a certain hostility emanates from Quebec politicians. "It's in the agenda of the separatists to be provocative to the rest of Canada, and then to go back and say that they were humiliated. If you are a nationalist Quebecois, it's part of your job to be humiliated before 5 o'clock every day."

One of Canada's most prolific novelists, Richler was asked only two or three questions pertaining to literature.

How did he come up with the idea for Jacob Two-Two? It was a story he wrote for his own children at their suggestion, he explained.

What does he think is missing in Canadian writing? "There's no need to be ashamed in front of the neighbors anymore," he replied. "There's an awful lot of good writing in this country, and you don't have to read like you're eating health food, because it's good for you."

Internet computer network used to fight anti-Semitism

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A Vancouver Island resident is fighting anti-Semites and Holocaust deniers via the global Internet computer network, which serves more than 30 million people.

Ken McVay, 53, who is not Jewish, has compiled for his Fascism and Holocaust Archives a massive amount of anti-Nazi material, which is used by universities, research organizations, Yad Vashem, PhD students and a wide range of other Nazi fighters.

McVay does his work alone on the $1,000 per month he earns from odd jobs.

Philosophy Professor Norman Swartz, of Simon Fraser University (SFU) in Vancouver, heard about McVay and, after studying his output and interviewing him about his work, recently published an 83-page report, Fighting Electronic Nazism: Finding Financial Support for the Fascism and Holocaust Archives.

Swartz has enlisted the aid of a SFU colleague, lawyer Marvin Stark of the university's business administration faculty.

In the report, Swartz says that "supporting McVay is of vital importance to all those who are alarmed at the ease with which neo-Nazis, anti-Semites and Holocaust deniers are broadcasting their perverted views worldwide on the Internet. If we don't help him, his voice will be drowned out by the hatemongers who will have hijacked the Internet."

Swartz says Canadian anti-hate legislation and legislation in other countries are powerless to stop the publication of hate fed through the computer network.

"The poison," he says, "can be injected into the Internet in any country on this planet, and the traffic is far too great to try and censor it. The evil genie is out of the bottle again and the only way is to reply with the truth, using the type of material McVay is providing."

McVay personally monitors Internet every day and when he decides a posting by an anti-Semite or Holocaust denier warrants a reply — which is often — "he constructs an appropriate response — usually a meticulously documented refutation."

He has established a worldwide network of associates dedicated to the refutation of Holocaust denial and neo-Nazi propaganda, says Swartz, including staff at the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles; Eli Rosenbaum, chief war crimes prosecutor for the U.S. Justice Department; and researchers at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem.

The network has evolved into the Holocaust Research Mailing List, which has generated more than 1,000 messages a day dealing with the development of appropriate material.

Since September, Jer 1, the Internet site in Jerusalem, has archived all of McVay's material and offers full access via InterNet Gopher. McVay told Swartz that Jer 1 plans to carry multimedia material and many gigabytes of Holocaust-related data. (One gigabyte equals 1,000 million bytes, or roughly 140 million words.)

McVay told Swartz that the neo-Nazis "offend me deeply. They offend my humanity and they offend my friends. If life is to be of any value, then I must do whatever can be done to protect your children and mine from them."

Being gentile, he added, "gives me a certain advantage in that I can't be attacked racially. I'm as pure an 'Aryan' as they come — blue eyes, blonde hair and lineage back to the Mayflower."

The Swartz report provides examples of Nazi lies that can be accessed on the network, as well as McVay's responses.

McVay says his computer work is an avocation but could be a full time job. To access him use the key word WAIS, at Freenet, Victoria, B.C., CA.

BJC, BJCC launch campaigns

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) and the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) have embarked on campaigns to retain existing members and attract new ones, in the wake of a 15-20 per cent drop in membership since January.

Two weeks ago, the BJC announced a package of incentives, including a temporary freeze on membership fees. Last week the BJC and the BJCC announced a reciprocal policy of recognizing memberships issued at the other facility.

In the past, membership in the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) entitled cardholders to use both the Bloor and north Bathurst branches. But with the recent re-organization of the former JCC into three distinct and separate corporate entities, questions were raised as to whether membership at one facility would be recognized at the other.

The recent announcement is intended to answer those questions, said BJC spokesman Howard English. The BJC and the BJCC have agreed in principle to allow reciprocal use of membership cards as "a courtesy for [former JCC] members," he said.

Harold Cipin, acting executive-director of the BJC attributed the 10-month drop in memberships to "the instability of the situation and the lack of confidence inside the community. I think people will come back once they know we're on solid ground."

Meanwhile, the BJCC has experienced a surge in new child and family memberships, said BJCC director Bill Emery. He attributed the growth to a special offer on family athletic memberships. Though the fee has gone up $200 to $836, it now includes all children's programs like swimming, gymnastics and dance, which were once subject to separate fees.

In other developments, the BJC announced it will be offering a new three-month membership at half the annual fee. That membership, geared particularly to members who are away for part of the year, must be pre-paid.

The BJC is also holding a telethon on Wednesday evening, Oct. 26 to alert members that they must register by Nov. 1 to obtain new cards and continue their membership, English said. Organizers expect to reach approximately 2,000 members in the one-night blitz.

Cooks who know can still count on Crisco

In this age of "new" and "nouvelle" everything, isn't it nice to see that Crisco, that traditional kitchen standby, is still going strong.

Crisco Oil and Crisco Shortening, both made by Procter and Gamble, are high quality products for cooking and baking.

Crisco has a "No Fail" pastry recipe which makes a dough that is easy to handle and that bakes up light and flaky. (This is the recipe that has been advertised in Crisco's "Chudleigh's" commercials for the past year).

Crisco is a high quality, all-vegetable shortening especially formulated for baking. It is great not only for pies, but for any recipe calling for shortening.

Golden Crisco, with its rich melt in your mouth flavour, makes moist and chewy cookies. For a really great treat, try the Ultimate Chocolate Chip Cookie Recipe on the 1 lb. box.

Today's trend is to healthy eating, not the greasy recipes we used to want. Crisco Oil is a high quality vegetable oil, made from 100 per cent pure canola oil, so it is low in saturated fat and cholesterol free.

Crisco oil is light tasting, and won't leave a heavy odour or a heavy oil taste when frying. It is great for frying, baking, and on salads.

Crisco Oil, Crisco Shortening and Golden Crisco are all kosher and parve under the supervision of the Kashruth Council (COR).

The Chicken Nest offers guilt-free dining experience

Most of the chicken and rib dishes are barbecued, a much healthier alternative than deep frying or pan frying. Everything is prepared with attention to detail, right down to the freshly-baked French baguettes.

Regal's bountiful offerings grace King Solomon's Table

A perfect party, an elegant dinner, or a cheerful family take-out meal eaten in front of the television – all these options are available via Regal Kosher Caterers.

Owners Joe Elmaleh, C.A., Rabbi A. J. Eisenberger, Mendy Goldman and catering manager Joanne Katz consider each other friends as well as business associates, and this attitude, notes Joanne, spills over into the relationships they have cultivated with their customers.

"Our focus is exclusively on the clients, and our undivided attention and personal touch is given to every detail", says Joanne.

Business is flourishing at Montecassino Place, where Regal caters for all occasions such as weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs, and special events in the beautiful banquet salons.

The hotel offers comfortable suites for guests, with group rates and weekend discount packages.

Classy King Solomon's Table, with its panelled walls, intimate lighting, soft music and outstanding service, is "the" place to go for dinner. Additionally, the restaurant is available for business lunches or private parties on Saturday evening or Sunday morning/afternoon.

Patrons can choose from a large, varied, go-back-as-often-as-you-want Chinese buffet, which changes daily, or from a delicious and appealing menu, complete with continental dishes and mouth-watering daily specials. A reduced version of the buffet (fewer items, but still all you can eat) is available at lunch time.

The Wok 'N Deli at Clark and Hilda is a lively, friendly place to take the family, or to drop in for a quick yet appetizing meal. The only problem is deciding between Chinese, deli or continental food. All these options are available for take out too and you don't have to wait until baseball or hockey come back. Why not treat the family to a special Regal meal?

Ready-to-bake products available at Lenchner's

Forty-three years ago, Dov Lenchner opened a bakery in Tel Aviv, the first wholesale kosher bakery on the city's north side. It is still recognized for the high quality of its products.

Dov's son Zeev established Lenchner's in Toronto in 1987, maintaining the same excellent standards his father has always kept.

Chocolate and cinnamon rogalach, potato, onion, mushroom, feta cheese, spinach with feta cheese and mushroom bourekas, a dynamite apple strudel, French puff dough, croissants, danishes are just some of the products available at the factory retail outlet on Drumlin Circle in the Steeles and Allness area of Concord.

"We originally started as a supplier for the wholesale market," Zeev explains. "But we decided to open to the retail market too."

This is not a regular bakery. All the products are ready-to-bake; Lenchner and his staff prepare all the goods with care and skill, then freeze and package them. All the customer has to do when he or she gets them home is follow the simple instructions, bake them, and savor the flavor and aroma of fresh-baked goodies.

"We do everything so that the customer will have 100 percent success at home," Zeev says.

Lenchner's can even supply baking sheets at a very reasonable price so the food won't stick to the pans.

There is home delivery on orders over $25.

Everything is marked as parve or cholov yisroel dairy, and is under the supervision of the Kashruth Council, Toronto COR 321.

Raisins Almonds & More more products, more kosher

Raisins Almonds and More has a new look.

Brand-new owners Elana and Roni Kalef are renovating the premises. "It's all fixed up now, cleaner, neater, with everything arranged differently but it will be even better when it's finished," Elana says.

The major change, though, is that they are now carrying only kosher, rabbinically certified products on their shelves and in their bins, completely separated from any non-certified goods.

"We had to do a lot of research to find kosher products that are also healthy and, for instance, fat free," she says.

The Kalefs are justifiably proud of their wide selection of grains, bulk candies, and chocolates. As well, there is an extensive selection of specific diet products, fat-free, wheat free lactose free.

"Have you any idea how hard it is to find products like that that are kosher too?" Elana laughs.

A popular service Raisins, Almonds and More offers is their gift baskets. They will make up elegant and appealing baskets, with any kind of kosher products that the customers want, and even deliver it.

They will also deliver large orders of regular store products.

Some of the products now in the store are kosher cheese cake, vegetarian cutlers, kebobs, nuggets and burgers, packaged or bulk. They even have fresh pasta made from fresh vegetables.

Chai Poultry upgrades processing facilities

Energetic, looking to the future – this is an apt description of Chai Kosher Poultry, the only plant of its kind in Ontario.

Packaged and loose, the company ships chickens, turkeys, cornish hens and stewing hens. Its staff of 53, includes four shochtim (slaughterers) and three mashgichim (kashruth supervisors).

Poultry prepared under Lubavitch auspices also comes from Chai Poultry.

The company, is the only Jewish family-owned and operated chicken poultry processor in Ontario.

Ontario raised poultry

Chai is proud to offer turkey in new packaging to give different ideas for healthier cooking.

Turkey scallopini, kebabs, steaks and steakettes are available on completely biodegradable styrofoam trays.

Healthy low-fat foods

It processes and delivers daily (even up to three times a day when called for) to neighborhood sites and chain stores, including Perl's Meats, Miracle Food Mart, Food City, Sunnybrook, Loblaws, Highland Farms and Loeb's.

The company has recently undergone major renovations to upgrade and modernize its processing facilities, so as to ensure quality and prompt service.

In this day and age, with health conscious consumers turning more and more to healthy, low-fat food, it is comforting to know that those who keep kosher can also get high quality, conveniently packaged poultry, prepared under the highest standards of kashrut and cleanliness.

Sam Firestone Caterers: Your Affordable Kosher Solution

So you want excellent value, consistent high quality, and polished service, not to mention lip-smacking food? All strictly kosher? Go no further than Sam Firestone Caterers, for 30 years the caterer at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, 470 Glencairn Ave.

Two years ago, Sam's son Les joined the operation. While maintaining what he calls "the 1960s tradition of service," he updated and upscaled the menu to adapt to today's trend towards healthier, lighter foods.

"I changed all the menus," Les said. I even added vegetarian offerings, and people rave about our fish dishes. They are surprised that a fish meal can be so terrific."

People think that going to a synagogue for a simcha is too expensive, but Les points out that Firestone Caterers "is less costly than you might imagine. There are no hidden surprises. I deal with customers honestly and in a straightforward way. They know what to expect, and they get what they expect.

Hands-on service

"You don't have to spend a whole lot to have a great party."

And that's another thing — Les, in his capacity as catering manager, offers "hands-on" service. "I'm there from the initial interview until the affair ends, meeting the customers' needs."

He even consults and advises customers on such matters as decorations and colours.

Sam Firestone Caterers does not only do large, lavish affairs (although they are terrific at that too!). You can arrange for a whole range of simchas, from weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, corporate and organizational events, to sheva brochas.

Excellent reputation

And they do it all with style and class, as attested to by their long-standing excellent reputation.

Everything served is the freshest and the best available, from fruits and vegetables in season, whenever possible, to fish, fowl, and meats.

They have had the same chef since Firestone himself came to the synagogue, so you can be sure of getting consistent, elegant and supremely tasty food, Les promises.

He has even updated the children's menu. No longer does the junior set have to settle for hot dogs — they can have such popular selections as fajitas or Chinese food.

Humpty Dumpty fills kosher snack food gap

Kosher snack lovers will be pleased to note that most Humpty Dumpty chips and pretzels are kosher.

The company koshered its three plants in Brampton, Ontario; Hartland, New Brunswick;and Montreal, Quebec over 3 years ago and by now most bags have a kosher symbol on them, reports brand manager Catherine Beauchemin.

She says that the companmy is now in the process of working with rabbis to study the possibility of its other products becoming kosher as well.

"Especially in markets such as Toronto and MOntreal, there is a big demand for kosher products and Humpty Dumpty wants to keep up with those demands. Since our snacks and sales have definitely increased."

Made from pure vegetable oil, Humpty Dumpty snacks are low in cholesterol and high in good taste.

"We have just launched a new line of chips, that is kosher as well! And we believe that this product, the Ripplin's, is the most fabulous product on the market!" says Beauchemin.

What's new at Dairy Treats?

What's new and exciting on the kosher restaurant scene? It's an uptown sister store to Dairy Treats, and is scheduled to open in early November in the Spring Farm Plaza at Clark and Hilda.

It will have a new name, (you will just have to wait and see what it is!) and an expanded menu, including, promises owner Shlomo Esses, gourmet pizza.

"It will have the same delicious breads and bakery products, including high quality European cakes, as the Bathurst Street store," Esses says, just everything a bit different and exciting.

High fibre whole wheat, stone ground and multigrain breads, and San Francisco sour dough and rye breads are loaded with taste and goodness.

Besides some 15 varieties of rolls, there are such tantalizing bagel varieties as sesame, poppyseed, multigrain and whole wheat.

Oh, don't worry — you can still get the gourmet Dairy Treats catering you are used to, specializing in crisp vegetables and dip, fresh fruit or fish trays and dairy platters.

Meals at both locations will be luscious dairy selections, while the baked goods will be parve. Everything is under the supervision of the Kashruth Council.

To all those people who miss the delectable foods of Tastefully Yours – rest assured that Tome and Deanna Schaffer of Malmar Catering are still going strong, offering the same imaginative cuisine and excellent service you've come to expect from them.

While no longer catering to Beth Sholom Synagogue, the Schaffers still specialize in in-house and corporate catering, as well as simchas and entertaining in your home.

They are glad to advise clients on the variety of different foods available. Each menu is customized to reflect the taste of the client, and uses only the best and freshest of ingredients.

"You will be proud to give your guests the food we have prepared, because of quality, freshness and presentation," Deanna Schaffer promises.

For those with special health needs, such as low-fat, low salt, dietetic or vegetarian diets, Malmar will make foods in quantity to be frozen until needed.

Some people use this service to stock the freezers of their elderly parents or children away at university, who find it difficult to prepare nutritious healthy and appetizing meals for themselves, Deanna Schaffer explains.

A new name and a complete renovation of the store has not altered Boro Park on Bathurst's commitment to service, freshness and an ever-widening selection of kosher products.

"Customers are surprised to find so many different products in a kosher store," says owner Leslie Rosenberg.

For instance, where else can you find 18 varieties of kosher, parve flavored coffee beans, ground on the premises for you to maintain their full freshness and taste.

You just can't beat fresh pasta. Rosenberg packages many different varieties of pasta, and labels them with the packaging date. "The customers like that, because they can tell just how fresh it is."

Boro Park on Bathurst offers nuts, dried fruits and beans in bulk, as well as an expanding line of the store's own spices, now over four dozen varieties.

Cheese can be purchased (and vacuum-packed, if the customer wants it) in bulk, shredded or sliced.

Even the bakery department is expanding. In addition to carrying a full line of Kernel natural bakery products, Rosenberg has begun baking danishes and rolls.

Eilat looks forward to a 'hot' winter tourism season

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

ISRAEL — Aharon Dekel, chair of the Eilat Hotel Association, is concerned about competing with neighboring Aqaba, Jordan, and hotels in the southern Sinai, but believes his city can remain the area's top tourist destination.

The way to compete, he said, is through increased development. There will always be tourists who want to stay at a secluded hotel and lie on a quiet beach, he said, but most visitors want to be where the action is, and the action is in Eilat.

"If we want Eilat to remain the main city in the Red Sea area, we have to build more hotels and more shopping centers," he said.

Eilat is at a disadvantage with regard to prices, Dekel said, mainly because a hotel worker in Jordan or Egypt makes $70 to $100 a month. A similar worker here costs an employer $1,200 a month, including room and board.

However, Dekel believes tourists will pay more to stay in a place with more attractions, more restaurants and more shopping and proximity to a modern hospital.

Visitors to Eilat can take short trips to archeological sites like Santa Katerina in Sinai and Petra in Jordan, thanks to the recent peace accord with Jordan.

An overnight tour to Petra, the dramatic Nabatean village carved into cliffs, with a stay in a four-star hotel is being marketed by Galilee Tours for $195, not including the fee for a Jordanian visa, which ranges from three dinars (about $4.50) to 30 dinars.

Reli Slonim, manager of the 421-room King Solomon's Palace Hotel, a part of the Isrotel chain, is convinced the ease with which tourists can cross the border will attract more visitors to the area. Last year, 130,000 tourists visited from October to May.

Daniel Roger, marketing director for the Isrotel chain, which, with five hotels and some 1,600 rooms is the largest hotel company operating in Eilat, said his company has regular promotional seminars and workshops for travel agents.

The chain recently hosted the Institute of Travel and Tourism, an organization of British travel industry leaders, at its new Royal Beach Hotel. The chain is concentrating its efforts on the non-Jewish market, which, he said, is where the greatest potential lies.

There are 2,000 seats a week on direct flights from the United Kingdom to Eilat. "That's small change, compared to Spain," Roger said.

David Bernas, manager of the renovated 240-room Caesar Hotel, believes warm-weather destinations like Miami, Morocco, Tunisia and the Canary Islands are Eilat's main competition. Even so, Bernas expects a winter occupancy rate of over 90 per cent for the four-star Caesar Hotel.

'THIS YEAR SOME 170,000 VISITORS ARE EXPECTED'

Dekel said the current round of construction in the city should be completed in about four years. That is when he expects competing destinations along the Red Sea coast to begin their building projects.

By December, Dekel said, the Eilat Foreshore Development Company will open two new lagoons in the north beach area. One, near the Jordanian border, is for bathing and will increase the beach area by 1,200 meters. The other, for sports activities, is to be connected to the existing lagoon and is to have some 1,300 meters of waterfront.

By the end of 1995, the number of hotel rooms should increase 1,000 to 6,500, to 8,000 rooms by the end of 1997, and to 10,000 rooms by the year 2000.

Despite all the construction, the town actually looks less like a huge building site than it has in the past. The building is mainly on the periphery of the present tourist area and builders are now required to enclose building sites with protective walls.

The number of tourists in the town is expected to keep pace with the building, Dekel said. This year some 170,000 visitors are expected.

Among the new charter companies planning regular weekly flights to Eilat are Airtours and Owners Abroad from the United Kingdom, and Jet air from Belgium. Tjaereborg, the giant Scandinavian travel company which pulled out of the Eilat market 15 years ago, is re-entering the scene.

There will be double the number of weekly flights from Holland, Belgium and Austria and, starting in November, a weekly direct charter flight from Moscow, with a capacity of about 190 passengers.

The winter season follows a summer in which — despite the much-publicized Israeli exodus to Turkey — Eilat was filled with locals on vacation.

The hard part, of course, is keeping visitors happy, a job which begins at the airport. Recently Tourism Minister Uzi Baram appealed to his colleague, Transport Minister Yisrael Kessar, as well as to the police, to increase the number of police handling incoming passengers, both at Ben-Gurion Airport and especially at Uvda Airport, which handles nearly all Eilat charter flights.

Only two or three of the 12 police posts at Uvda are operating, forcing tourists to wait up to three hours for passport checks.

"I don't want to have to depend on Jordan, or Egypt, for an airport, although I don't mind if they depend on us," he said. "I want to have the best slots [for take-off and landing times] and in Europe I want to see Eilat up there on the list of destinations, and not Aqaba."

A trip into Victorian times

By PHYLLIS KRASILOVSKY
Special to The CJN

Visiting the sights of Asheville, N.C., is like taking a trip back to Victorian times.

One of the foremost of the city's century-old buildings is the Biltmore estate, North America's largest private residence (on Highway 25, north of exit 50).

George Vanderbilt's 255-room mansion, completed in 1895, was modeled on the Loire Valley chateaux of the 16th century. Tremendous rooms, many ballroom-sized, are furnished with carefully maintained antiques and decorated with brocade, gilt and superb arrangements of fresh flowers. The bed chambers could easily qualify for five-star hotel ratings.

In the basement is a huge tiled pool and an exercise room, as well as the kitchen and pantries and the quarters that housed the servants.

Some of the many art works (purportedly 50,000) include antique furniture inlaid with beautiful wood, as well as paintings by artists such as Pierre Auguste Renoir and portraits by famous American painter James Whistler, who was an occasional guest at the mansion.

A three-mile avenue of trees leads to the 8,000-acre Biltmore house gardens, which visitors can drive through. The formal and informal gardens were designed by landscape architect Frederick Law Olmstead just after he completed New York's Central Park.

On the property there is a winery (North Carolina is rated 10th in U.S. wine production) where guests can enjoy generous samples of four distinctly different wines.

Visitors to Asheville can choose to stay at one of a number of Victorian bed and breakfasts, such as the Cedar Crest at 674 Biltmore Ave., where beds are make with lace-trimmed linens. Sparkling cut glass pitchers of iced tea and lemonade are served with cookies on the porch or on the croquet lawn next to the Victorian flower garden. Elaborate formal breakfasts are served by the hospitable McKuens, who willingly share their extensive knowledge of the area.

Also worth visiting is Biltmore Village, whose boutiques and galleries are in the restored English-style homes once intended for George Vanderbilt's employees in this model village.

Novelist Thomas Wolfe's house, the Old Kentucky Home boarding house at 48 Woodfin St., was once so filled with lodgers he couldn't have a room of his own. The furniture in the large frame house is spartan, but one can see samples of marble angels carved by his father, and the room where his brother Ben died, bringing to life memorable scenes from his first acclaimed novel, Look Forward Angel.

Perhaps the most moving item on view is the large suitcase Wolfe brought with him when he came home to die. It is so shabby, as are the neatly-folded clothes on top, that it seems more likely to have been the suitcase of a farmer or a travelling salesman than that of a talented writer.

Asheville's Folk Art Centre, famous for its local crafts, features the creations of regional artists, sculptures from native woods and red clay, as well as fine weaving and glass sculptures.

Even if you don't stay at the Grove Park Inn Resort at 290 Macon Ave., it is worth visiting to see the Mission furniture and massive stone fireplaces, as well as prize-winning tennis courts and golf courses, and an unforgettable sunset over the Blue Ridge Mountains.

Forty minutes from Asheville lies Carl Sandburg's Connemara at Flat Rock Playhouse off Little River Road. Sandburg's working clutter and goat-keeping are brought back to life by a guide who leads a dramatic walking tour of the house and grounds. The romantic setting next to a lovely lake serves to remind visitors of Sandburg the poet.

Rothschilds Exhibit in Frankfurt: The Rothschilds — A European Family is the exhibition that opened this month at the Jewish Museum of Frankfurt in conjunction with the city's 1,200th anniversary celebrations. The Rothschilds' banking dynasty, which in two generations came to dominate financial circles in London, Paris, Vienna and Naples as well as Frankfurt, originated with the five sons of one humble Frankfurter, Meyer Amschel Rothschild.

Objects in the exhibition have come from all parts of Europe, Israel and the United States, and are displayed in the villa that was the Rothschild family home in the late 19th century. The exhibition is on view until Feb. 27, 1995. For details, contact the German National Tourist Office, 175 Bloor St. E., North Tower, Suite 604, Toronto M4W 3R8. Phone (416) 968-1570.

Florida Keys: Many Canadians visit Florida every winter, but relatively few go south of Miami to the chain of narrow islands that dangle southward from the tip of the Florida peninsula, known as the Keys. Tenuously linked to the mainland by the ribbon of blacktop called Highway 1, the Keys feature such interesting communities as Key Largo, home of a large coral reef state park, and Key West, which offers a multiplicity of diving opportunities.

Also on the Keys is Bahia Honda State Park, which features camping, picnic sites and great beaches. For more information on the Keys, phone 1-800-FLA-KEYS (352-5397)

Chanukah in Virginia: The Grand Illumination officially opens colonial Williamsburg's holiday season on Dec. 4, when candles are lit in hundreds of windows of restored and reconstructed buildings in this historic Virginia town. Similar candlelighting festivities occur in the neighboring regions of Yorktown, Gloucester County and Newport News. In the port city of Norfolk, the festival of lights begins on the morning of Dec. 4 with an observance of Chanukah at the Moses Myers House, the home of one of Norfolk's earliest Jewish citizens.

Sanibel and Captiva Islands: This pair of islands, situated in the Gulf of Mexico off Fort Myers, Florida, is known for their unspoiled, pristine beaches — and the many Canadians who come here to prowl for sea shells. The waters here are warm, clean and very calm, the three ingredients needed for observing shallow water creatures.

Captiva is an environmentally protected island, with the state limiting the number of man-made structures built near the wide beaches. Sanibel Island, much of which is preserved as a wildlife refuge, is home to more than 200 species of subtropical birds, alligators and wildlife.

Firm develops a medical probe

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A rapidly growing medical technologies company has found a way to ease post-operative pain and reduce hospital stays for neurosurgical patients.

A probe developed by ISG Technologies Inc. utilizes computerized three-dimensional cross sections of the head and body to allow surgeons to make more precise cuts. "You should do far less damage to the patient you're operating on," said neurosurgeon and company head Dr. Michael Greenberg.

He said the usual post-operative hospital stay for a patient undergoing tumor removal is 10 days. By using ISG technology, the surgeon can make a smaller hole in the patient's skull and avoid unneccessary cutting while searching for the tumor, all of which can mean a quicker recovery.

The technology, called the Viewing Wand, shows the surgeon exactly where the patient's tumor is located. "You'll be traversing through less of his brain," Greenberg said, "finding the shortest or the best route to the tumor."

After using the Viewing Wand for 250 operations over the past year and half, a neurosurgical facility in Bristol, England, found patients were getting out of hospital in about five days instead of nine.

As cash-strapped hospitals are looking for medical technology that improves care while lowering costs, the Viewing Wand has been a marketplace success. So far, the company has sold 50 of the units priced at $250,000 dollars each to hospitals around the world.

Along with the Viewing Wand, ISG produces a variety of two- and three-dimensional medical imaging technologies used by radiologists, surgeons and others to analyze patient anatomy. It also supplies imaging software to scanner manufacturers.

Listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange and New York's NASDAQ, ISG Technologies has grown at a phenomenal pace since Greenberg founded the company's visual data processing business. He has been president since 1988.

ISG revenues rose from $1 million in 1988 to $20 million in 1994, and the company reported its first profit in the latest quarter of this year. In 1993 and 1994 it was listed among the top 100 growth companies in Canada.

The company, said Greenberg, had rather inauspicious beginnings, in part because the software available seven years ago was not sophisticated enough to create high quality medical imaging.

"We got to the point in one year when we went from nothing to merely being the worst company in the field, but we were now in the field," he remembered. "We were at the bottom of the heap but we were in the heap."

At a medical imaging trade show in Chicago, Greenberg was impressed by the three-dimensional image of a hand produced by Israeli company El Scint. The image's creator, Doron Dekel, was recruited to head research and development at ISG.

Under Dekel, ISG developed the Viewing Wand, and in 1989 negotiated its first big deal with a U.S. distributor. "We grew at about 20 per cent a quarter for the next nine or 10 quarters," said Greenberg.

Currently ISG has aggressively set out to become the dominant player in the medical imaging industry. "Our goal is that every box where vizualization is done has to have our software," said Greenberg. "In that way we supply the industry, they use our software and fight among themselves to sell it to the doctors and hospitals."

This week The CJN features... O Mei Restaurants

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — On the 10th anniversary of O Mei, a restaurant specializing in Cantonese, Szechuan and Peking cuisine, Ringo Ip still believes in giving his customers great food, personal service and good prices.

Since opening the original restaurant at 618 Sheppard Ave. W., Ip and partner Jimmy Tang have expanded to include locations at 420 Highway 7 E. in Richmond Hill, 248 Steeles Ave. W. in Thornhill and 5150 Yonge St. in the North York City Centre.

"The business has grown, but the personal touch is still very much there. My philosophy is to stay in touch with the customers and to do so, I am constantly moving between locations. I'm always around because it is important for everyone to know who I am," says Ip.

Quality dishes are a mainstay at O Mei and to maintain this quality, ingredients are brought in daily and food is always made to order. "Our food has been imitated, but because I invent the recipes and make all the major sauces myself, it will never be duplicated," Ip says.

Always keeping abreast with the times, O Mei has changed its cooking to minimize fat. "We use a lot of vegetables, and many dishes are stir fried or steamed. People have become very aware of their diets so we make sure our dishes are not greasy."

Party time, either at home or at the restaurants, is a favorite time for Ip. "I attend every party and I am even the disc jockey for the first half hour. If there is more than one party, I get to each one and make sure everyone is happy."

O Mei supplies serving staff and a disc jockey. For home parties, "we make more than one trip to ensure that the food is hot and crispy." Hors-d'ouevre are brought first, followed by main dishes after about 40 minutes. Staff finish these dishes at the home, using boiling water to steam the dish to completion. "That way," Ip says, "everything has a nice fresh color, is steaming hot and tastes good."

With the initiation of lunch-time delivery in September, O Mei becomes a pioneer in the field. "Fresh, hot lunches delivered quickly are something that customers have wanted for some time," Ip says. "It will be a great service for those having business meetings or those who just can't get out at lunch time."

Ip cannot stress enough how much he values his customers. "It is important to me to walk around, meeting new customers and greeting the regulars. We provide fast service so waiting isn't long and we make sure there is always enough staff on hand.

"When we say we believe in quality food and personal service, we really mean it."

Israel is undergoing a media explosion

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israel is in the midst of a revolution.

With the recent coming of cable television, satellite technology, and the information highway to Israel's homes and offices, the country is undergoing a media explosion with far-reaching implications, according to a veteran of Israel's television industry.

As a sign that it has indeed become a player, says Johanna Prenner, a former director of Israeli Education Television (IETV), Israel was chosen as the focus of a "gala evening" during the fifth international scientific film festival held recently in Montreal.

Prenner, who served as a judge (the only female judge, she points out) during the festival, spoke during the evening that showcased several IETV productions.

In an interview, Prenner said the days are gone since the only choice Israelis had was between the one home-grown Hebrew channel (ITV) and Jordanian television, with its 5-year-old reruns of vintage American fare.

Since the advent of cable in 1992, Israelis have had up to 40 channels to choose from — including CNN, the British Broadcasting Service, a sports channels, an all-movie channel, and a children's channel — just like their North American couch potato counterparts.

"It's been a bit of a trauma," said Prenner. "It used to be that all Israelis talked about the same thing every day because everybody watched the same thing.

"Now it's hard to find two people who watched the same show the evening before."

The television and media techology revolution has had far-reaching implications within Israel, Prenner said.

The first is that much of the parochialism that marked the Israeli sensibility until 1992 has been forced to become more media "pluralistic," she said.

Last fall Israel began a second national commercial channel to compete with ITV. Unlike ITV, which is financed through licensing fees, the second Israeli channel is being funded through three private franchises.

This second channel, along with the cable stations now available, is forcing Israeli television, grown complacent through the years because of an absence of competition, to adapt to the times.

Evolution

"To succeed, we have to become competitive," Prenner says. "For so long, Israel was a closed society. Now there is craving for communications."

Prenner, now an independent media consultant, has a decided interest in the success of the new channel since she was hired to help get it going.

In the mid-1960s, Prenner, then a school teacher, got into Israeli television when she joined the fledgling IETV, funded by the Rothschild family.

Maybe as a reflection of the importance its society placed on education, the commercial station (ITV) started broadcasting about a year after IETV. But IETV and ITV have shared the same channel position for about 30 years.

The evolution of IETV is also something of an indication of how Israeli television progressed even before the advent of cable.

When Prenner began as an all-in-one producer, writer and host of educational science programs, IETV did not even have an editing machine. Every time she made a mistake, she now recalls with a laugh, she had to start from scratch.

Thirty years later, IETV has a budget of $25 million, ⅓ of which comes from the education ministry.

Its programming, Prenner says with pride, has received acclaim both in Israel and abroad for its scope and sophistication.

Of IETV's 3,000 hours broadcast annually, ⅔ is home-grown, the rest imported productions.

Over the last few years, the Israeli version has been well-received on the U.S. educational network under the name Shalom Sum-Sum.

Internationally, IETV programming has won several prizes in Japan and was nominated for the prestigious Jules Verne Prize in Paris last year.

Prenner is convinced that the evolution of IETV and Israel's entering the competitive media and information highway fray will make for a better overall Israeli product and work to the benefit of all its people.

TIPS FROM PROS

By VERA N. HELD
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The information highway poses a major challenge for all business communicators. For example, how can we use technology like Voice Mail and E-Mail well — and still keep them human?

In conjunction with technical training, Voice Mail and E-mail users need communications coaching on using good judgement skills, and common sense in choosing the appropriate tool, message and tone.

Many organizations today are faced with management and staff who use technology because they have to, not because they are committed to using it nor to using it productively.

How can organizations gain management and staff commitment? How can they eliminate some of the 70 per cent of workplace errors that stem from a lack of quality communications? Here are some tips to get management and staff focused on using technology, keeping it human, and increasing their professional productivity.

E-Mail Communication Tips

Ask yourself if this is the best medium to get your message across, especially with the person being addressed. Will the reader feel comfortable receiving this message in writing? On the system? Who is the reader? What does the recipient need to make a decision? Is a phone call needed? A face-to-face? A meeting? A lunch?

If you decide to go with E-Mail then focus on:

(a) giving a clear purpose

(b) selecting content: right kind, right amount

Example: Benny: I'd appreciate your feedback on Monday's strategy session. Can we get together Friday at 11? Please confirm. Thanks. Edith.

When dealing with a "hot topic," bang out your message — and let it sit. Come back to the text for an objective edit before you fire off the final version. Your goal is to solve a problem, and this will be clear in the commitment you show in your message.

Voice Mail Communication Tips

Before you call, think about how you're feeling. Your tone of voice will affect how your message is interpreted and responded to.

Example: Is your tone pleasant? anxious? enthusiastic? frustrated? Will your tone encourage or discourage a response by the listener? Will your tone create goodwill?

Phone messages need to be crisp; if the situation calls for more than a simple exchange of information, then ask the person to call you and leave a time when you can be reached.

Example: Hi. Ruth. It's Jerry Busbaum. I hope you're having a good day. Just wanted to let you know, Stan's got the figures you were looking for. He's around today after 10:00 at extension 613.

Give phone numbers slowly — it's an annoying time waster to have to replay a message to catch the phone number.

Vera N. Held, MEd, owns VNH Communications.

PEACE BALLOONS

'Never again', Clinton says at Yad Vashem

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — U.S. President Bill Clinton concluded his trip to Israel last week with a visit to the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial, where he expressed the hope that the Jewish people will never again "suffer and die because of their race or their faith."

Accompanied by Israeli President Ezer Weizman and Yad Vashem Chairman Avner Shalev, Clinton took part in a memorial ceremony at the Ohel Yizkor Memorial Hall, where the names of Nazi death camps are etched into the floor.

During last Friday's ceremony, Clinton, flanked by two U.S. Marines in dress uniform, rekindled the Eternal Flame and laid a wreath at the symbolic grave for the six million Jews who perished in the Holocaust.

The U.S. president pulled a kippah from his pocket, put it on and bowed his head when Kaddish was recited.

Clinton then continued to the memorial for the 1.5 million children who perished in the Holocaust. Emerging from the dark chamber with its thousands of flickering lights, he remarked that it was "an extremely moving experience."

Clinton, who earlier in the week attended the historic signing of Israel's peace treaty with Jordan, inscribed a message of hope in the Yad Vashem visitors book.

"Today we have come one step closer to the time when the people of Israel will live in peace with all of their neighbors; when the awful events of death and destruction memorialized here will be banished to the past; when the people of Israel will never suffer and die because of their race or their faith. May G-d make it come to pass," the president wrote.

Shalev, who has guided other world leaders through Yad Vashem, said later that Clinton asked many questions about the Holocaust.

"He was one of the more interested and warm visitors I have met," Shalev told reporters.

Clinton toured Yad Vashem after attending an early morning breakfast with Weizman, following which he told reporters that he would not rule out the possibility of returning to the region soon to help move the peace process along.

Clinton also said that he had promised Weizman to do all in his power to get information about missing Israeli soldiers from Syrian President Hafez al-Assad, with whom Clinton held talks during his tour of the Middle East.

Weizman said such information would be regarded by Israel as a confidence-building gesture on the part of the Syrians.

It was also announced that the Israeli president and his wife, Reuma, would make a state visit to Washington early next year.

Israelis, Canadians attend historic economic summit

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

CASABLANCA — The historic economic summit that opened last Sunday night in this Moroccan city included an Israeli delegation comprising no less than seven government ministers, members of the Knesset, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

Israeli delegates were in the company of more than 720 politicians from 60 countries and 1,200 top executives from private firms in the Arab world, Canada, the United States, Europe and the Far East.

The three-day Middle East-North Africa Economic Summit, hosted by King Hassan of Morocco, was hailed as a first-of-its-kind meeting to consolidate peace in the region through economic cooperation and development.

Several Canadian blue-chip companies had been invited to attend, among them, Bell Canada, Northern Telecom, Canadian-Pacific, Alcan and Hydro-Quebec.

Canadian delegates included Lison Benarroch, a member of the Communaute Sepharade du Quebec (CSQ) and chair of Montreal's Ecole Maimonide.

Rabin used the occasion to announce the re-opening of Gaza Strip border crossings which were sealed following the Oct. 19 bus bomb attack in Tel Aviv.

The borders are slated to re-open this week to the 30,000 Palestinians in the Gaza Strip who work in Israel, but Rabin vowed to do "whatever is needed" to stop violence by Palestinian extremists.

Rabin also held talks with PLO leader Yasser Arafat, who also attended the conference. It was the first meeting between the two since the bus bombing.

In his opening remarks, King Hassan said the conference would strengthen peace and enable residents of the region to live in harmony.

Hassan congratulated Rabin, Peres and Arafat for being named co-recipients of the Nobel Peace Prize. The king also hailed the peace treaty signed last week by Israel and Jordan, which Arafat has strongly criticized.

U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher called on the Arab countries to end their economic boycott against Israel. He also emphasized the importance of investment — in particular from the private sector — to fortify peace in the region.

Arafat said he hoped the 21st century would see the establishment of a Palestinian state, and he stressed the importance of economic strength in forming the basis for regional peace.

In his remarks, Rabin thanked King Hassan for his role in nurturing the Middle East peace process.

"I came to you 18 years ago, disguised, in secret, in search of peace," the prime minister said. He was referring to his secret visit to Morocco in November 1977, a move that paved the way for the late Egyptian President Anwar Sadat's visit to Jerusalem and the signing of a peace treaty with Egypt in 1979.

Rabin called on the international business community to invest in the autonomous Palestinian zones of the Gaza Strip and West Bank Jericho district as a means for overcoming terror and forming a strong economic life for Palestinians.

"Poverty is the fertile ground" for the Islamic Jihad, Rabin said, referring to one of the fundamentalist Muslim groups opposed to Israel's ongoing peace initiative with the Palestinians.

All countries from the Middle East and North Africa took part in the summit, with the exceptions of Iraq, Iran, Libya, Syria and Lebanon. Syrian and Lebanese businesspeople were reportedly participating in a private capacity.

Some 200 of the 800 companies in attendance were American, including Bechtel, Citibank, DuPont, General Electric, Hewlett-Packard and Phillip Morris.

The conference represents a landmark for Israel, which, for the first time, was welcomed at the highest level in an Arab country as an equal partner.

Israeli and Arab business leaders came equipped with proposals for specific investment and cooperation projects.

Israel is proposing more than 100 joint projects worth about $25 billion (U.S.), half of them for water projects, Israel Radio reported.

Other Israeli proposals include a cooperative project for tourist development in the Red Sea area. Israel Television reported that Egyptian and Jordanian participants brought with them similar proposals.

There were news reports that the creation of a regional development bank would be announced at the conference, as would the establishment of regional councils for business and tourist issues.

The plans for these regional bodies were to be announced in a "Casablanca Declaration," at the conclusion of the summit.

The economic summit is seen as another step toward ending the Arab economic boycott of Israel, with Peres saying the conference essentially ended the boycott in practice.

"It is impossible to have such a conference and continue the Arab boycott," he said.

In deciding not to formally attend, Syria complained that the conference would weaken the economic boycott as a bargaining chip in negotiations.

Still, few of the participants, including Israelis, expected hard deals to emerge from the summit. Rather, it seemed a forum to establish contacts and nurture international investment in regional development projects.

"We're definitely expecting to build the infrastructure for economic contacts," said Israeli Finance Minister Avraham Shohat.

The conference also presented a forum for diplomatic encounters.

While the Israeli media devoted nonstop coverage to the summit's opening events, a flurry developed in Israel over whether the size of the Israeli delegation should have been as large as it was.

Knesset member Naomi Blumenthal of the opposition Likud Party complained that even the weekly cabinet meeting had to be canceled because most ministers were out of the country.

Among the absentees were Environment Minister Yossi Sarid, who was in Tunisia for a two-day conference on the environment with counterparts from Mediterranean nations.

Peace agreement celebrated

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella and Hani Khalifeh, Jordan's ambassador to Canada, met in Ottawa last week to toast the historic Israel-Jordan peace agreement hours after it was signed.

But it was a bittersweet meeting. Abella and a small CJC delegation were also there to say good-bye to the genial ambassador who is leaving Canada after almost nine years to take up a new posting.

"He's an open, friendly, moderate diplomat who the moment the [peace] process began made contact with us to have a relationship with the Jewish community," said Abella after the meeting. "There wasn't a month that would go by without him calling to ask about the community."

Sadness about the departure was easily overshadowed by delight over the accord.

"I shared with Professor Abella the feelings of happiness that peace has been acheived and will be continued in the history of the region," Kalifeh said. "We look forward to the future with optimism and great hope. I am very optimistic. I think it is great."

Abella said the ambassador was proposing a Congress university presidents' mission to Israel and Jordan, similar to last summer's mission to Israel. With peace, the ambassador said, Congress could now lead a mission to establish trilateral research and teaching agreements between universities in Canada, Israel and Jordan.

Abella said the suggestion will be given priority.

The ambassador also spoke highly of Canada's role in supporting the peace process.

Jordan is the second Arab country to sign a formal peace agreement with Israel. The ambassador said it will usher in an era of prosperity for both countries.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, greeted the Jordan-Israel peace treaty with enthusiasm tempered by sadness.

Only days after the Hamas suicide bombing in Tel Aviv that claimed 22 lives, members of Congress' Ontario and national leadership in Toronto were briefed on the Islamic extremist group by visiting Israeli journalist Ron Shaked, one of Israel's foremost experts on terrorism.

Following the briefing, Ontario region chair Gerda Frieberg said "we'd like to be euphoric about the peace agreement. But the sadness is still there.

"We're deeply concerned about Hamas."

Frieberg, who visited the Jordanian port city of Aqaba last summer, said Jordanians she met "were very enthusiastic about peace. They are looking forward to tourism and exchanges. They don't want their young people to die [in wars].

"There is a real possibility that [peace] will bring prosperity. We consider this a warm peace."

Stephen Victor, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), said the treaty-signing ceremony "is a significant step toward the achievement of the enduring Israeli goal of peace and normalized relations with its Arab neighbors. We hope [it] will lead other Arab countries to formalize peace arrangements with Israel as well."

Na'amat Israel president visits

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — If there is one thing Ofra Friedman, the new president of Na'amat Israel has to say to Canadian Jewish women, it is "Thank-you."

Thanks for supporting the Na'amat daycare centres, legal aid clinics, family violence counselling centres and the new women's shelter in Tel Aviv, a joint Canada-Israel project.

But don't sit back and rest, she warned; there will be plenty of work in the coming years as Na'amat builds on its successes.

The Israeli lawyer was in Ottawa last week to meet the national board of Na'amat Canada and talk about the organization's projects.

The goal of Na'amat is to advance the status of women in Israel. To this end, the organization runs the country's largest network of daycare centres, accommodating 23,000 children, which enables women to join the workforce. This has been particularly helpful to the thousands of Soviet immigrant families, many headed by single parents, who have come to Israel in the past few years, Friedman said.

Na'amat has legal aid clinics in cities and villages throughout Israel that help women with equity, harassment, discrimination and divorce complaints. And it runs 14 vocational schools to teach trades to students who don't suit the academic stream.

Ofra Friedman

As a political organization whose past presidents have all gone on to hold seats in government, Na'amat is trying to encourage women to run for office.

"We believe if women are in those positions they influence the agenda," Friedman says.

Na'amat was ahead of its time in supporting the peace process, the item that tops the agenda of the moment. Peace is the only sane course for the Middle East, Friedman says.

"We believe that when we have peace many women's problems will be solved... We believe dollars that are transferred to security issues will be transferred to social issues."

The key to peace is to bind Israelis and Arabs in joint projects, she adds. To that end, Na'amat has long included Arab women in its chapters. An Arab woman currently heads Na'amat Israel's foreign affairs department. And because language is critical to communication, all Na'amat chapters in Israel now teach Arabic.

Despite the bombing last week of a bus in downtown Tel Aviv just down the street from Na'amat's offices, Friedman says the peace process will continue.

"There are people on both sides who are against [peace]...The sane people have to lead. There is no other way."

While Na'amat Israel is grateful for financial support from its Diaspora chapters, says Friedman, the organization is taking a new direction. She would like to see Diaspora chapters volunteer time in their own communities. Friedman said the new focus will appeal to Jewish women who want to make a local contribution by working, for instance, at local women's shelters.

Na'amat made a start last year when it organized vigils across Canada in support of agunot, women whose husbands refuse to grant them a Jewish divorce.

Etty Danzig, president of Na'amat Canada, says the organization is preparing to launch its Hand in Hand campaign to financially support women's services in Israel. The goal is to enhance the dignity of women.

Rosalie Abella speaks at CJC Western Conference.

Rosalie Abella stresses need for human rights

VANCOUVER — Human rights allows one to be "proudly different" without fear of the consequences, an Ontario judge told delegates to the Western conference of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), held here recently.

A strong proponent of pluralism, appeal court Justice Rosalie Abella geared her talk to the conference theme, And Justice for All.

Human rights, she said, protects individuals discriminated against because their group has been stereotyped.

When barriers impede individuals, they should be removed, she said, even if this means treating people differently.

In Canada, Abella said, unlike the United States, "we have always considered the right to integrate, based on differences, compared to the assimilation in the United States ... That is why we believe in and promote multiculturalism."

She said human rights are the basis of civilized society. "[It] requires willingness to see first and then define, so we can listen and respond to people whose identities have kept them out and who want in. And they want, and should have, the choice of who they want to enter as."

Justice is the policy of Israel, says Shelef

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

CJC WESTERN CONFERENCE

VANCOUVER — The path of "justice and righteousness" as proclaimed by G-d to Abraham is the Jewish response to life, said Israeli ambassador Itzhak Shelef at the Western conference of Canadian Jewish Congress, held here recently.

Speaking at a session on ethnic relations, Shelef said it would be presumptious to talk about the "Jewish response," but as a representative of the world's only Jewish state, he said Israel's "instinctive response to the victims of ethnic strife is rescue — or at least attempted rescue."

The policy of rescue, he said, "springs from the values, culture and tradition which are deep within Judaism."

The first man to understand and respond to the Lord's desire "that justice, justice thou shall pursue" (Deuteronomy) was Abraham, "and this has been his chief legacy to his children — to you and to me, for all generations."

It's a legacy which Abraham's legendary descendants at Mount Sinai "endeavored to engrave into the stoney hearts of all mankind and which the rest of us, through dispersion and persecution, have borne with dignity."

Although justice and righteousness cannot necessarily constitute foreign policy, Shelef said, "it did and it does get factored into decisions around the cabinet table. Ben-Gurion referred to it as the policy of 'active virtue'."

In the late 50s, Golda Meir introduced a rescue policy in Third World countries of Asia, Africa, Latin America and the Mediterranean basin.

Between 1958 and 1973, Israel sent thousands of experts in agriculture, hydrology, regional planning, public health, engineering, community service, medicine and education to the developing countries of the Third World. At the same time, Third World students came to study in Israeli universities. In all, Israel carried out more than 200 development programs in more than 80 countries, Shelef said.

In 1977, Israel accepted 66 Vietnamese refugees, mostly children, and earlier this year absorbed hundreds of refugees from Bosnia and Serbia, including many Muslim families.

Over the years Israel has sent medical aid missions to Armenia, Bosnia, Cambodia, Cameroon, Moldova, Romania, Russia, Turkey, Ukraine and Zaire.

"Wherever we have resided on earth it has been infused in the psyche of the Jewish people, by the voice of conscience and by the ethics of the prophets, to provide justice and righteousness, action and rescue," he said.

"Isaiah's injunction that we be 'a covenant people, a light for nations, to open blind eyes and bring out prisoners from the dungeon,' encapsulates the Jewish response to international ethinic strife within our means and capabilities. It is also the response of the Jewish state."

He recalled that establishment of a convent at Auschwitz, "the world's largest Jewish graveyard," caused a dilemma. However, "considering our inter-ethnic relations," the World Jewish Congress was eventually able to negotiate with the Pope for the removal of the convent.

"Tolerance," he added, "is fundamental in relations with other groups, but it doesn't mean forgetting our principles."

Canadian national unity called hopeless pipe dream

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — National unity in Canada is a hopeless pipe dream and will never be achieved, agreed three veteran Western observers of the Canadian scene at a session of the Western conference of Canadian Jewish Congress, held recently at the Jewish Community Centre in Vancouver.

Prof. David Bercusson of the University of Calgary bluntly stated the problem of regionalism versus national unity has no solution. Only the departure of Quebec, or a realization by a new generation of Quebecers that Canada isn't such a bad place after all, could ease tensions, he said.

Dr. Leroy Little Bear of the University of Lethbridge called Canadians a "conglomerate" of individuals.

"We talk about unity in diversity but don't live up to it," he said. If all the cultures in Canada were combined, "we would have an identity that nobody else has. But there are no leaders to achieve this."

Vaughan Palmer, provincial affairs columnist for the Vancouver Sun, said he was pessimistic about the future of national reconciliation.

Palmer pointed out that British Columbians opposed Meech Lake and rejected the Charlottetown refereundum. "National reconciliation is not part of B.C.s policy," he said.

Prof. Gerry Gall, in giving thanks, said there is no commonality among Western provinces. Multiculturalism is under attack in Canada, he warned, "and Alberta is trying to abolish it."

Beilin's message fails to stir delegates at B.C. conference

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The audience at the Western conference of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) was not fired up by Yossi Beilin's message.

The Israeli deputy foreign minister's prescription for Jewish continuity called for a Beit Israel, an international organization to serve as the liaison between Israel and Diaspora Jewry (CJN Oct. 27).

In the message transmitted to the conference at the Vancouver Jewish Community Centre through the Israel Embassy in Ottawa, Beilin advocates that this organization bring Jewish 17-year-olds from all over the world to Israel for a month, at the expense of social welfare activities in Israel.

Beilin's words were read to delegates by Joe Wilder, a Winnipeg lawyer who presided at a forum on Israel, Diaspora and the Jewish community.

Nobody spoke for or against Beilin's proposal. Indeed his suggestion for strengthening Jewish continuity and identity resulted in very little discussion.

Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress (WJC), said Jewish continuity is the latest Jewish catch phrase, which, he added, "bothers me. We should be pushing aliyah and we should be talking about it. That's the real solution for our relationship with Israel."

The central issue since 1948, has been the security and well-being of Israel and it will continue to be the central issue, Steinberg said.

He said the Jews of the Diaspora don't know how to deal with the peace process. When Israel's security was at stake, Jews in the Diaspora could pressure their governments to help the Jewish state. "But we can't serve as intermediaries with our governments any more — we must now deal with a free market in Jewish life — a market economy."

Steinberg noted that more than $100 million is spent in the United States by Jewish defence organizations to fight anti-Semitism. He suggested that instead, $95 million be spent on Jewish education and $5 million on "wiping out swastikas."

Moshe Ronen, national chair of CJC Israeli affairs, said being Jewish without Israel is irrelevant.

The partnership with Israel is unequal, he said. "We care for Israel but Israel's role is in the front line — in the forefront in saving Jewish lives all over the world."

The focus has changed. As Israel heads for peace, he continued, Zionist leadership in the Diaspora is becoming bankrupt. Funding for Jewish education is reduced, even though "we raise funds for local needs on the back of Israel."

It is essential to form a response to create an equal relationship with Israel. At present "we are only a suburb."

Ronen called for strong activism on behalf of Israel to help the cause of Jewish continuity. "We must arm Rabin with our feelings for peace. We must set the mood."

Ronen urged Canadian Jews to take up the challenge of convincing the government to become proactive in the peace issue and ban Hamas in Canada. He said the strong action Prime Minister Trudeau took in Quebec when separatist terrorists committed murder and carried out kidnappings and bombings is the precedent for dealing with terrorism.

Itzhak Shelef, Israel ambassador to Canada, called for stronger commitment to Jewish education to maintain a Jewish future in the Diaspora. He suggested that Israel can play a key role in education and outreach.

He urged a new relationship between the Diaspora and Israel in helping reduce the high incidence of intermarriage.

Shelef proclaimed his readiness to "serve as midwife" in developing a partnership. "We are ready and able to play our part with your educators," he said. "We are children of the same parents and our future is intertwined. We must work hard to secure the future of the next generation."

All the panelists agreed that Jewish education must tie in with Jewish religion and this must begin in the home

B.C. aims to eliminate racism

VANCOUVER — The British Columbia government "is working hard" to ensure B.C. is a welcoming province, free of racism and discrimination for everyone, Premier Mike Harcourt told delegates to the Western conference of the Canadian Jewish Congress held here Oct. 22-23 at the Jewish Community Centre.

"Hate is insidious," the premier said at a luncheon session. "If unchecked it will destroy the community from within."

He declared that multiculturalism, anti-racism and human rights "are a top priority of my government, as they are with the Canadian Jewish Congress."

He said the government is committed to ensuring no one is discriminated against because of ancestry, religion or skin color.

Harcourt pointed out B.C.'s Multiculturalism Act states that racism and discrimination have no place in the province. This policy statement is backed up by an anti-racism program administered by Multiculturalism B.C., a division of the ministry of multiculturalism. The minister has a special advisor on racist activities.

Mike Harcourt

Harcourt told delegates his government last year passed Bill 33, an amendment to the Act, aimed specifically at combating hate propaganda, and has provided an additional $1.7 million in funding for immigrant serving organizations. "Part of these funds will go towards anti-racism, immigration settlement and cross-cultural understanding projects."

The premier recalled that in 1985, when Vancouver's Temple Sholom was razed by arson followed by a similar attack on the Schara Tzedeck funeral chapel, "I was proud, as mayor of Vancouver, to stand by your side and lend support. During this time of crisis many people who weren't Jewish also provided overwhelming support to the Jewish community. This gives me great hope that British Columbians of different cultures and religions stand together to overcome racial attacks."

The premier praised CJC for its work. "It is through the work of dedicated community organizations such as Congress that the multiculturalism goals of this province are reached." M.L.

Racist groups using new methods

VANCOUVER — Racism in Canada has developed new ways of getting its hate messages across.

Even more disturbing than the extent of racism are the means and methods racist groups use to spread their poison, said Michelle Falardeau-Ramsey, of the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

"When I find out that hate propaganda is circulating in school grounds, I am particularly incensed," she said. Hate groups are not only using traditional printed paper messages, but have started using computer information lines and bulletin boards, she added.

While there are high profile examples of neo-Nazi extremists, more difficult to combat is the subtle racism that keeps people in specific groups from being hired or being accepted at universities, she said.

"When we talk about employment equity, that's the type of discrimination we are trying to combat," she said.

Former journalist Warren Kinsella, who wrote about racism in Canada in his book Web of Hate, said the growth of the extreme right in Canada is "alarming." He said, "They definitely cling to an ideology of hate."

Kinsella, now an Ottawa lawyer, said the hate groups are not just a problem for government but for everyone in Canada. "Together, we need to find ways to combat the racist tide of hate," he urged.

In his book, Kinsella linked white supremacist groups in the United States to individuals he claimed are active in Canada. He even uncovered an international group of Nazi lawyers, which has Canadian lawyers as members.

Panelist Bill Black, a Law professor at the University of British Columbia, is reviewing the British Columbia Human Rights Act for the B.C. government. M.L.

Promoting Aliyah changing with times

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Aliyah, at the end of the 20th century and closing in on the 21st, is stressing mobility and marketing, said Judy Amit, executive director of the North American Aliyah Delegation.

She was interviewed during a recent visit to Montreal

Already, she said, aliyah is being promoted primarily by getting kids to Israel by bar and bat mitzvah age and by making use of the information superhighway to reach the e-mail and Internet generation.

Amit, a former New Zealander who made aliyah 28 years ago, is the first woman to oversee the running of 29 aliyah offices in North America, three of them in Canada (Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver).

The new global outlook for promoting aliyah in North America, Amit said, is taking into account the very high prospects for peace. These will be creating new markets and industries and more demand for professionals in Israel's hi-tech industries.

"Israel and the Diaspora have to reassess their relationship," Amit says. "Within the next 10 years Israel will for the first time overtake the United States in Jewish population.

"We have to de-traumatize the way the North American Jewish community has perceived Zionism and aliyah. The world is now a mobile society. Zionism no longer means spending 12 months in Israel. People can move backward and forward."

This strategy seems to be working, if the aliyah figures cited by Amit are any indication.

Three years ago, North American aliyah to Israel numbered 1,900. This year, it is expected to hit 4,000. Montreal alone expects its number of olim to go from 86 last year to 150 in 1994.

Amit says, "Up to the year 2000, we expect the figures to go up 15 per cent a year."

The precise strategy to reach those figures fits in neatly with the continuity agenda of the Diaspora community. The thinking now is to get as many young Jews to Israel as soon as possible to minimize assimilation, establish an emotional connection, strengthen Jewish identity, and plant the potential seeds for future aliyah by providing a realistic for-taste of Israeli society, she said

Judy Amit

Now, aliyah departments, as well as programs like the Israel Experience, are seeking to guarantee exposure to Israel to as many North American Jewish youth as want it.

"The people with no contact with Israel are the ones who are not going on aliyah," Amit says. "It is a fact that Jewish children who go to Israel at a younger age have a greater chance to identify as Jews. You can't identify properly as a Jew without Israel."

Adults, by contrast, are being targeted through pilot trips that give them a realistic picture of what to expect after they move to Israel.

As well, Israel is sending delegations of professionals from high tech industries to North Amercia to attract U.S. and Canadian talent, which is in high demand

The Association of Americans and Canadians in Israel (AACI), a support group and social network for olim from the United States and Canada, now has a data base to help new immigrants track down jobs

Compared to years ago, North American shlichim are adopting a more realistic approach in promoting aliyah by furnishing prospective olim with the facts, Amit said.

The result is "a much smaller recidivism rate," she said. "Now, the majority of people who go on aliyah have already visted Israel several times."

For those who do make the decision to go, "the chance for successful integration is much higher," she said.

Tourism's importance to Israel is stressed by IGTO director

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

During a recent 10-day period, the world watched in awe as a series of highly dramatic events, both good and bad, unfolded in Israel.

They included the kidnap and murder of an Israeli soldier, the awarding of the Nobel Peace Prize to Yitzhak Rabin, Shimon Peres and Yasser Arafat, the death of 22 Israelis in a Tel Aviv bus bombing, a peace declaration between Israel and Jordan, and a visit by U.S. President Clinton.

For Ruth Ben-Tzur, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto, the peace process is unstoppable, despite the terrorism that seems to push the country one step back for every two steps it advances towards peace.

"We're fighting the terrorists and we're proceeding with the peace process," she said in her office in Toronto. "These are not two opposite things. The willingness and the desire of all parties in the Middle East to achieve peace and harmony is so strong that there is no way that any small group of extremists can stop it."

Ben-Tzur met recently in her office with several Canadian Arabs and found their desire for peace and moderation was no less strong than her own.

"I felt so free, like I was looking to a partner," she said. "We seem to have the same interests, and we want to achieve the same things, using the same methods. It makes one ask, 'Why didn't we discover each other years ago?'"

Despite the Tel Aviv bombing, visitors to Israel are just as safe as they would be in England, the United States, Canada and many other countries, Ben-Tzur insists. Random acts of violence can occur anywhere, she says, not just in Israel. "I don't see any reason for anybody to postpone or cancel a trip, because by doing that, in a way, we're acting out of fear or terror, and doing exactly what the terrorists want."

Tourists play a strong positive role in cementing regional peace, Ben-Tzur asserts. Tourism revenues will bring prosperity to all parties and ease dissatisfaction among Palestinians and others.

"I'd like to ask the Jewish community of Canada to show their support for the people of Israel and to show them that they are not alone," says Ben-Tzur. "The way to do this is not just with donations, but by coming to visit."

Israel cracks down on its most dangerous foe

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Israel is at war with Hamas, known officially as the Islamic Resistance Movement.

Last week, the Israeli government announced new measures to combat Hamas, an Islamic fundamentalist group which marks its seventh anniversary next month. An Israeli cabinet minister said that Israel will mete out "special treatment" to Hamas, suggesting that Israel's secret service will hunt down and eliminate its leaders.

Hamas, as Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has warned, is Israel's most dangerous guerrilla foe, a disciplined, well-trained enemy committed to undermining the peace process, destroying Israel and establishing an Islamic state on its ruins.

In the past few weeks, Hamas has intensified its grisly campaign of terrorism — killing two civilians in Jerusalem; kidnapping, then murdering, a soldier after a failed Israeli commando raid designed to free him; and detonating a bomb on a bus in the centre of Tel Aviv which snuffed out the lives of 22 people.

And Hamas, which has claimed responsibility for the majority of attacks against Israelis since the signing of the Israel-PLO Declaration of Principles in September 1993, promises more such assaults in the future.

So even as Israel makes headway in the peace process, Israelis should expect Hamas to carry out its threats.

Hamas was founded in December 1987, literally days after the intifadah (the Palestinian revolt) on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip exploded.

It was established by seven Palestinians under the leadership of Sheik Ahmed Yassin, a wheelchair-bound firebrand who was sentenced to life imprisonment plus 15 years in October 1991 for ordering the murder of Palestinians accused of collaborating with the Israeli authorities.

Since then, Hamas has become a force to be reckoned with, especially in Gaza, its chief base. By all accounts, at least 40 per cent of Gaza's inhabitants are sympathetic to Hamas. The comparable figure for the West Bank is reportedly 20 per cent.

As a result, Hamas and its chief rival, the secular PLO, are embroiled in a fierce power struggle for hearts and minds. The PLO is wary of seriously confronting Hamas, fearing that full-scale fighting could touch off a civil war.

Hamas, whose political strength is reflected in its control of local chambers of commerce, trade unions and professional associations, springs from the Muslim Brotherhood. The latter was founded by a charismatic preacher, Hassan al-Banna, in Egypt in 1928.

Having spread its tentacles throughout the Arab world, the Muslim Brotherhood promotes Islamic values and advocates the formation of Islamic states in the region.

Yassin, the most respected figure in what is now Hamas, set up a branch of the Muslim Brotherhood — the Islamic Centre — in the territories in the early 1970s.

With Israel's permission, he created a network of religious, social and welfare institutions. Israel did not oppose his activities, regarding them as a useful counterweight to the PLO.

But Israel misjudged Yassin. In 1984 Yassin was charged with stockpiling weapons. Sentenced to 12 years in jail, he was released in a May 1985 Arab-Israeli prisoner exchange.

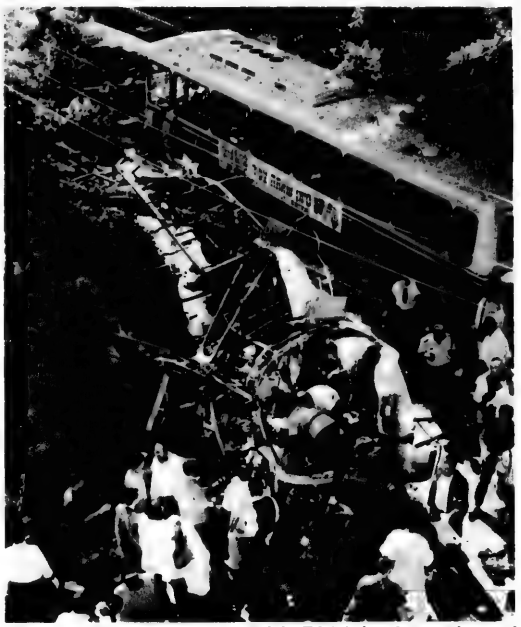
By the time he was freed, Yassin's organization had grown significantly, spurred on by the 1979 Islamic revolution in Iran, the 1981 assassination of Anwar al-Sadat at the hands of Islamic fundamentalists and the 1982 Israeli thrust into Lebanon.

With the intifadah, Yassin switched gears. He and his loyalists had remained largely aloof from the violent protests against Israel's occupation, leaving the field to the PLO. But once the intifadah broke out, Yassin changed tactics.

He and six associates formed Hamas, which cooperated with, but never joined, the PLO-dominated intifadah leadership. Hamas demanded a 40 per cent share of the seats in the Palestine National Council, the Palestinians' parliament-in-exile, but the PLO balked.

In August 1988, shortly before the PLO recognized Israel and accepted United Nations resolution 242 (which acknowledges the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all states in the Middle East), Hamas issued its charter.

Clear and unambiguous, the charter calls for "the liberation of Palestine in its entirety, from the (Mediterranean) sea to the (Jordan) river." In a sense, Hamas is a throwback to the old PLO, which espoused a secular Palestinian entity in place of Israel.



Rescue workers comb the wreckage of the Tel Aviv bus that was destroyed by a Hamas terrorist bomb. [Israel photo]

Abdul-Aziz Rantisi, one of Hamas' founders and head of the Gaza Medical Association, told the Jerusalem Post in a 1992 interview that its long-term goal is "a pan-Islamic state."

As for defusing the Arab-Israeli conflict through diplomatic means, he observed: "We do not trust the peace process. The Jews will give us nothing because they want the land from the Nile to the Euphrates."

In line with this rejectionist philosophy, Hamas has struck a strategic alliance with Palestinian factions opposed to the 1991 Madrid peace process. Its allies include the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, headed by George Habash, and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine:General Command, led by Ahmed Jibril. Both groups are based in Damascus.

The military wing of Hamas, the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigades, has killed Israelis — civilians and soldiers — in Israel and the territories. Among its victims was Lieut. Col. Meir Mintz, the highest-ranking officer ever killed in Gaza during the intifadah. He was gunned down in an ambush in December 1993.

With its loose, decentralized structure, Hamas is hard to track down and infiltrate. Members of its military wing, said to number fewer than 100, are organized in small, self-contained cells.

Israel has been locked in battle with Hamas since 1987, but it has proven a resilient and resourceful adversary.

In December 1992, following the kidnapping and murder of Israeli border policeman Nissim Toledano, Israel expelled some 400 Hamas leaders and activists to southern Lebanon. But within about a year, under international pressure, they were allowed to return to their homes, although some were rearrested.

In the past, Hamas has received funds from Iraq and Saudi Arabia. Today, Iran appears to be its main backer. Reports suggest that Iran has funnelled $30 million (US) to Hamas and allowed it to open a liaison office in Tehran.

Iran opposes the current peace process and rejects Israel's existence.

The Hamas Manifesto — 10 Principles of Faith

1) Hamas swears to conduct a holy war over Palestine against the Jews until Allah's victory is achieved.

2) The land must be cleansed of the filth and evil of the tyrannical conquerors.

3) Under the wings of Islam, it is possible to have peaceful coexistence with other religious groups. But without Islamic rule over the Dome of the Rock, there can only be hatred, controversy, corruption and repression.

4) By command of the Prophet, Muslims must fight the Jews and kill them wherever they are.

5) Hamas strives to set up an entity wherein Allah is the highest purpose, the Koran is its law, jihad [holy war waged on behalf of Islam as a religious duty] is its means, and dying for the sake of Allah is the noblest wish.

6) Palestine is a holy Islamic entity until the end of time. Therefore, it is non-negotiable and no one can give up any part of it.

7) It is a personal, religious commandment for every Muslim to engage in the jihad until the land is redeemed.

8) Hamas opposes any kind of international talks or negotiation as well as any possible peace arrangement. Sovereignty over the land is strictly a religious matter and conducting negotiation over it means giving up some measure of control by [Islam's] believers.

9) The Jews control the media and the world financial institutions. By means of revolution and war, and organizations such as the Masons, Communists, capitalists, Zionists, Rotary, Lions, B'nai B'rith, and the like, they undermine human society as a whole in order to destroy it. By their evil corruption they try to gain domination of the world by such institutions as the United Nations and its Security Council. More details of their iniquity can be found in the Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

10) Hamas opposes any secular state the PLO would seek to create in Palestine, since by definition it would be anti-Islamic. On the other hand, if the PLO would adopt Islam and follow its flag, then all of [the PLO's] members would become freedom fighters who would light the fire to consume the enemy.

CJC MEETS WITH BOUCHARD

Bloc Quebecois and opposition leader Lucien Bouchard (centre) met last week in Ottawa with Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella (right) and CJC Quebec region chair Manny Schacter. On the agenda was hate propaganda, Holocaust denial and the controversy over Canada's spy agency, CSIS. On the issue of Nazi war criminals, Bouchard said he would look into the status of several cases which involve denaturalization and deportation.

Neo-Nazi movement targets campuses for new members

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Holocaust-deniers are increasingly targetting youth on university campuses and using the most modern communications technology to get out their message of hate, said Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre (SWC).

"The neo-Nazi movement has changed its emphasis from trying to recruit membership to trying to get their message out," Littman said.

They have climbed on board the Internet computer network, employed video and audio tapes to record their views and attempted to broadcast their message through local and satellite television transmissions, he said.

In recent months, the Holocaust-denial movement has aimed its message at Canadian and American campuses, Littman said. Bradley Smith of the Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust has taken out full-page advertisements in about a dozen U.S. campus newspapers, questioning the Holocaust.

Toronto-based neo-Nazi Ernst Zundel has also attempted to promote a "debate" on the Holocaust in Canadian campus newspapers, Littman said.

Campus newspapers, as well as The CJN have received an "open letter" from Zundel inviting a debate about the Holocaust and touting his "work for German-Jewish reconciliation."

The Simon Wiesenthal Centre, in conjunction with Canadian University Press, has published a 66-page booklet to counter Holocaust "revisionists."

Titled Holocaust Denial: Bigotry in the Guise of Scholarship, the booklet has been distributed to all campus editors in Canada. Other copies will be sent to Canadian and U.S. academics, to members of the Canadian media and to high school teachers.

The SWC last winter held a workshop for campus editors in Regina to inform them about the Holocaust-denial movement, he said, adding that Zundel has been unsuccessful in getting his message into campus papers.

While campus editors have the discretion to refuse advertisements, there is currently no way to prevent Holocaust-deniers from accessing the Internet, Littman said. The material on the computer network "is as vile as we've ever seen. It's smearing, taunting, degrading."

Littman said the SWC is considering setting up a special international bureau to monitor and respond to the message of Holocaust-deniers and other hatemongers.

Following complaints from Front member George Harbottle, police searched the home of James Scott Dawson, 34, who allegedly pointed two guns at Harbottle and his companion, Karen Lyons. Police searched Dawson's home and seized an AK-47 assault rifle, ammunition and a .25-calibre handgun. Dawson, one of the founding members of the Heritage Front, was charged with two counts of pointing a firearm and one count of unsafe storage of a weapon.

"It's something to be deeply concerned about that a man involved with extremist racism should have in his possession dangerous weapons," said Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress.

Farber said the conflict between Front members is a sure sign of the decline of the group. Others in the organization, including its leader Wolfgang Droege, are facing a variety of criminal charges, while one of its key members, Grant Bristow, has been identified as a CSIS informant.

Suspended University of Toronto professor Robert O'Driscoll, author and editor of books considered anti-Semitic, was arrested last week in a village near Arthur, Ont. Police said a man "in a state of inebriation" broke into a home, caused damage, smashed windows and assaulted the occupant.

Islamic group denies call for war against Zionists

MONTREAL — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles says it has intercepted a statement, written on the letterhead of a Montreal Islamic group, describing Israel as a "cancer" and calling on Muslims everywhere "to declare a war without pity on the Zionists and their allies until the flag of Islam flies over Jerusalem."

The statement is signed by Dr. Youssef Mouammar, director of the Fondation Internationale Musulmane du Canada Inc. and dated Oct. 20.

But in an interview last Saturday with the Gazette, Mouammar said that, while he agrees with some elements of the statement, he does not favor terrorism outside Israel's borders, and he denied having written the call to arms.

The statement, written in French, says Muslims "must take all measures to torpedo and sabotage" the Israel-PLO accord, "which will be torn up in the blood of those who signed it."

It continues: "We consider armed struggle as being the only means to provoke the definitive disappearance of Israel from the map of the world.

"We demand all those fighters in the Path of Allah to intensify their attacks against the forces of evil [Israel] ...Everywhere, reprisal actions against Israel and its allies must take place. Israeli personalities and officials must be eliminated and companies representing Israeli interests in the world must be destroyed. These reprisal acts must spare no one.

"Every Muslim is personally responsible before God for the task to which he has been assigned."

Rabbi Abraham Cooper of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre said the statement was intercepted in France.

Mouammar was quoted as saying that while his group supports the destruction of Israel and the foundation of a Palestinian state, he believes violent acts of terror should be limited to Israel proper and the territories.

He added that he has no idea who could have used his group's letterhead to produce the statement.

"Extremists on any side could have done this to discredit me," he reportedly said.

The mandate of the Fondation Internationale Musulmane Canada is to teach Islam, added Mouammar, a French-Canadian convert to Islam.

Rabbi Cooper said he hopes Canadian authorities will investigate the statement's origins.

Soldier killed in attack in Lebanon

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — One Israeli soldier was killed and two others slightly wounded last Saturday when terrorists from the Islamic fundamentalist Hezbollah movement unsuccessfully attempted to overrun an Israeli position in the southern Lebanon security zone.

Staff Sgt. Almog Klein, from Moshav Shafir in the northern Negev, was killed when a mortar shell fell next to the position where he was standing guard.

He was buried Sunday afternoon.

Klein was a month short of his 21st birthday and completion of his military service.

The wounded soldiers were treated in the field, in the eastern sector of the zone, and later evacuated by helicopter to a government hospital in Safed.

Israeli military sources described Saturday's attack as one of the fiercest launched at positions of the Israel Defence Force and its allied South Lebanon Army.

There was no immediate word on the number of Hezbollah casualties.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

NEMOY — KRUMER — SHTAMLER

Although there are many names that are descriptive of height (Hochman — tall man) and girth (Dickman — corpulent), there are sadly descriptive names that refer to a deformity:

Nemoy — dumb or mute, but also possibly from the Village of Nimojta or Niemoyki; Krumer — Crooked; Shtamler — a stutterer; Kosoy, Koskie — squint-eyed; Gorbat — hunchback.

Dear Community Member,

As chairmen of the 1995 United Jewish Appeal campaign, we have met many of the recipients of our UJA dollars and know that to many Jews in Toronto, our contributions mean the difference between poverty and dignity, and to other Jews overseas, the difference between life and death.

Miriam, a client of Jewish Family and Child Service, told us, "there were many times I thought of ending my life. I sat with sleeping pills in one hand and a glass of whisky in the other. Without the extra financial support there would have been no food on the table for me and my son."

"I would still be in a war zone," said Rachela Dzidic, upon her arrival in Israel from Sarajevo, last February, "if not for the caravan from the Jewish Agency that rescued me. The United Nations did nothing. Our Serbian neighbours were amazed that Jews all over the world care about other Jews they don't even know."

Fifty percent of the money raised by our UJA campaign provides services to the Toronto community through our local Jewish agencies, and subsidies to parents for their children's Jewish education. Fifty percent goes to the Jewish Agency for Israel for the rescue and resettlement of 6000 Jews each month who continue to arrive in Israel from the former Soviet Union and other countries in distress.

Thank you for your support of United Jewish Appeal. When you are called upon for your 1995 pledge, please remember that in saving Jewish lives we ensure that no Jew stands alone.

Yours very truly,

P.S. If you have never donated to UJA or have not yet been contacted by a canvasser, please complete the section below.

Rabbi Goren dies at age 77

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Rabbi Shlomo Goren, a former Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi of Israel and one of the country's most colorful and controversial religious figures, died last Saturday night of a heart attack at Tel Aviv's Ichilov Hospital. He was 77 years old.

He fell ill Friday night, as he made kiddush with his family at his home in Tel Aviv. He was admitted to the hospital's cardiac intensive care unit, where he died at 2 a.m. on Oct. 29.

His funeral Sunday left from the Tel Aviv Komimiut Synagogue, which he had established, to the Mount of Olives cemetery in Jerusalem, where a large crowd assembled.

Rabbi Goren was a forceful religious presence, particularly opposing Israel's accord with the PLO. He even issued what amounted to a death warrant this past June against PLO leader Yasser Arafat.

And he called for a day of fasting to protest "an agreement that has no halachic validity."

He also issued a ruling that soldiers should disobey orders rather than help oust settlers from the West Bank or Gaza Strip.

Despite his rulings on the West Bank and Gaza, however, Rabbi Goren was prepared to hand back much of the Golan Heights, which he did not regard as part of the Biblical Land of Israel.

In 1986, he sharply criticized a Interior Ministry regulation that the word "converted" be stamped next to "Jewish" on identity cards, saying Halachah forbids stigmatizing a convert.

Chief Rabbi Shlomo Goren

Rabbi Goren's history paralleled Israel's. He was the first Israel Defence Force military chaplain and established the Army's Chaplaincy Corps.

He was also known for his physical exploits.

An avid parachutist, Rabbi Goren arrived at the cave at Qumran where the Dead Sea Scrolls had been discovered, dangling on a rope from a hovering helicopter, in order to retrieve 2,000-year-old skeletons for religious burial.

During the Six-Day War, the rabbi advanced through Jerusalem with IDF troops and was among the first to reach the Western Wall. A photograph of him clutching a Torah in one hand and blowing a shofar with the other became famous.

Despite controversy, many of his religious responses were regarded as innovative and modern.

He wrote a work on the religious law concerning the Temple Mount, ruling that there are areas on it where Jews may pray. That was regarded as important because the area had been declared off-limits to Jews, as it had been the site of the Holy Ark, which could be entered only by Kohanim, or high priests.

His ruling also nullified a ban that followed the 1967 government decision to continue the status quo on the mount, which was run by the Supreme Muslim Council.

He also fashioned much of the halachic observance in the Army and wrote numerous halachic responses relating to religious observance during active warfare.

His rulings also eased the plight of war agunot — women whose missing husbands' deaths could not be confirmed and who thus could not remarry until proof of death was somehow established.

Rabbi Goren was Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi from 1972 to 1983. But his controversial period began after he left the chief rabbinate and founded the Idra Yeshiva near the Western Wall.

Politically, he became more outspoken in his criticism of the Labor-led government and to any talk of trading what he referred to as "G-d-given territory" in return for peace.

This past February, Rabbi Goren expressed displeasure at the secular burial of an Israeli soldier, the country's first. Rabbi Goren said IDF orders call for all military funerals to be performed by a chaplain. "Religious rites are an integral part of military funerals and cannot be separated by any desires of the bereaved family," he insisted.

This past summer, as fear gripped Jewish communities worldwide following bombings of Jewish buildings in Buenos Aires and London and a plane in Panama carrying mostly Jews, Rabbi Goren declared that Jewish law permits Diaspora Jews to move mezuzot from outer doorposts to inner doorposts to minimize danger.

Rabbi Goren, whose family name was formerly Goronchik, was born in 1917 in Zambrov, Poland. He immigrated with his family to Kfar Hassidim, which his father helped found.

TODAY'S UJA
1995 Campaign Update

Welcome to the inaugural column keeping you up to date about UJA's fast-paced Campaign '95.

Where are we now? About 10% ahead of last year with our volunteer batallions canvassing some 2,000 cards every week. So far, Business Cabinet co-chairman Scott Staiman has picked up pledges — many of them face-to-face — from over 30 contributors.

Super Sunday, September 11, the telethons that followed that week and Federation Sunday, September 18, accounted for well over $4 million of our goal to date. What an operation! Hundreds of volunteer campaigners covered dozens of shifts, canvassed non-stop on 156 phones, consuming at the same time, 20 dozen bagels, 10 dozen danishes and hundreds of cookies . . . Many thanks to Roz Davidson, who chaired this year's Super Sunday spectacular.

Marlon Levin, past chairman of the Young Business Network, has every reason to recommend changing UJA's slogan from Saving Jewish Lives to Meeting Jewish Wives. Marlon met his wife Hannah Springer at UJA. They were wed on October 2 . . .

It's hard to imagine how Cynthia Cooperstone found the time to write such elegant, lengthy diary entries during the Young Leadership Network's busy summer mission to Israel and Prague. Here's how Cynthia saw the city's Jewish cemetery:

> "Stones have sunk into the earth so that only the tops peek out and others are embraced by tree trunks grown around them. Time is wiping the stones smoother, more nameless every day . . . "

Why would a speech by someone gruesomely nicknamed "the grave dancer" draw hundreds of UJA volunteers? Because "the grave dancer" is Sam Zell and Sam Zell is an investment legend. Thanks to Tom Ehrlich, about 400 members of UJA's Construction and Investment divisions got a chance to hear the man who owns $6 billion worth of American real estate. When a company is "graveyard bound," Zell supplies life support. Buying low and selling high has made Sam Zell a very rich man, permitting him to indulge in a yellow plane, a yellow motorcycle and a yellow Mustang . . .

Congratulations to the Food Division's Lewis Rose who has developed quite an appetite for canvassing, to Larry Smith, the Division's latest addition, and to Adam Bower, the Fashion Division's new vice-chairman.

Listen carefully when the Pearlsteins talk about a family atmosphere in the workplace. They're experts at it. Father Al, together with sons Geoff and Mark - all UJA contributors - are stock brokers in the same office at the same company, RBC Dominion Securities. There's nothing like making your office feel like home.

For information on programs and UJA's many volunteer opportunities, call our HOTLINE today at (416) 631-5705.

Peace Watch keeps eye on leaders' actions

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israel was still counting its dead and wounded after the Hamas bus bombing in Tel Aviv when Dan Polisar picked up a telephone in his Montreal hotel room to book a flight home.

Polisar was anxious to return because as executive director of Peace Watch, a fledgling Israeli watchdog group with a mandate to impartially monitor Israeli and Palestinian compliance with the Declaration of Principles, he had to get back to assess the situation.

Polisar was invited to Montreal by Inter Amicus, McGill University law professor Irwin Cotler's human rights group, to speak before the McGill University law faculty on the Oslo Accords.

"When something like this goes on," said the soft-spoken Polisar, "we have to look at how both sides react."

"The PLO has a specific responsibility in light of this event," Polisar said. "Peace Watch will look at where the attack came from, where they got their weapons, and whether there were any steps the Palestinian police could have taken to prevent it."

Peace Watch was looking towards PLO chairman Yasser Arafat for his reaction, Polisar said, because it could signal the Palestinan Authority's commitment — as the DOP stipulates — to clamp down on terrorism. Arafat condemned the Oct. 19 attack.

Since Peace Watch was formed about last year, it has hired seven full-time and four part-time workers and investigators, including Palestinians. The group issues monthy reports on issues ranging from Palestinian council elections to statistical breakdowns of terrorist acts since the signing of the fragile peace accord between Israel and the PLO.

Primarily, though, Peace Watch studies how scrupulously Israel and the Palestinians have been sticking to the letter and spirit of the accords.

Polisar believes Peace Watch, modelled after Helsinki Watch, which monitors the Helsinki Agreement, is the only group in Israel reporting on the implementation, compliance and possible violations of the accords.

The U.S. born Polisar, 30, is Orthodox and a Harvard graduate. He has spent the last year raising the group's visibility and winning credibility as an independent and impartial watchdog.

Polisar did so by putting Israelis from the left and right on the Peace Watch committee. They include Rabbi Yoel Bin-Nun, a founder of the Gush Emunim settlers; former prisoner of conscience Natan Sharansky; and Mookie Tsur, former secretary general of the United Kibbutz Movement.

Polisar has also won Peace Watch points by showing a willingness to criticize both sides.

The group, for example, criticized the Israeli government for failing to crack down on violence-prone citizens — particularly in the wake of the Hebron massacre — and for delaying Palestinian elections.

And remarkably, Polisar swears that Peace Watch has managed to achieve consensus within its ideologically broad committee without having to water down its reports.

The group, to be sure, has also not spared the Palestinian side from criticism.

The group reproached the Palestinian Authority, for example, for not confiscating illegal weapons in the Gaza strip, and for releasing suspected terrorists from custody.

Peace Watch has also taken the PLO to task for not rescinding the PLO covenant and Arafat for not making unequivocal public statments calling for the end of the "armed struggle" against Israel.

Peace Watch has made it clear that Arafat has to act forcefully to end Hamas and Islamic Jihad terrorism, as the Gaza-Jericho Accord stipulates.

"He is expected to do all that he can," Polisar said. "But guns were not confiscated, people were released from jail. There has been a concerted effort not to punish.

"The performance of the Palestinian police has been poor. There have been more than 50 shooting attacks against Israelis in Gaza, but no suspects, no arrests, no extraditions."

Polisar conceded that while Israelis have by and large accepted Peace Watch as a neutral party, the average Palestinian has not. One reason, he agrees, is that no Palestinians sit on the Peace Watch committee, perhaps out of fear of being viewed as sell-outs.

Within Israel, Polisar said the reaction to Peace Watch has been "uniformly favorable," except for rejectionists who say the group has "legitimized the accords" and other critics who say Peace Watch focuses too much on the negative.

Leave to Appeal Sought

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region and the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools announced last week that they are seeking leave from the Supreme Court of Canada to appeal an Ontario Court of Appeal decision on the public funding of independent and religious-based schools.

In July, the Court of Appeal ruled that Ontario's failure to fund those schools does not violate the freedom of religion and equality sections of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In a statement, CJC said it has always believed that the ultimate decision on public funds for Jewish day schools would come from Canada's highest court.

Thank-you From Rabin for Grit MP

TORONTO — Toronto area Liberal MP Sarkis Assadourian has received a thank-you letter from Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Earlier this year, Assadourian, the member for Don Valley North, sent a letter to the Nobel Prize committee in Oslo, nominating Rabin for the Nobel Peace Prize.

Prior to his co-winning the prize, Rabin wrote Assadourian, thanking him for the nomination. "I am truly honored by your gesture," Rabin wrote.

"I was both surprised and honored to received the letter from Prime Minister Rabin," Assadourian responded.

Rabin to Attend GA

DENVER — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin will attend his second consecutive General Assembly (GA) of the Council of Jewish Federations, to be held here Nov. 16-19.

The theme of this year's GA is Jewish community building in the context of the larger society.

Hundreds of community professionals and lay leaders are expected to attend the GA, which features dozens of plenaries and workshops on the whole range of issues facing Diaspora Jewry.

World Jewish Congress president Edgar Bronfman will deliver a keynote address. Rabin will address the GA the evening of Nov. 17.

Others expected to attend are Israeli education minister Amnon Rubinstein, Likud MK Dan Meridor and health minister Ephraim Sneh.

U.S. Vice-President Al Gore is also expected to address a session.

Arabs, Jews on 'Peace Flight'

JERUSALEM — A special peace flight accompanied U.S. President Bill Clinton to the Middle East last week, as American Arabs and Jews traveled together to the signing of the peace treaty between Israel and Jordan.

Nineteen Arab-American leaders, 30 Jewish-American leaders and five additional religious leaders joined the U.S. delegation as Clinton's official guests. They were joined at the ceremony by additional American Jewish leaders, who had vied for coveted invitations.

The atmosphere on the plane was "warm and joyous," said Lynn Lyss, chairman of the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council. She said the rapport with the Arab-Americans "was like a coming together after we have been kept apart for so long."

Just before the plane landed, the travelers organized an impromptu interdenominational prayer service. One of the Arab-American leaders read from the Koran, and Jewish Theological Seminary Chancellor Ismar Schorsch said the prayer Oseh Shalom.

Most Disagree With PLO Talks

JERUSALEM — More than 77 per cent of Israelis disagreed with the government's decision to unconditionally resume negotiations with the PLO following the Oct. 19 Tel Aviv bus bombing which killed 22 passengers, according to a Gallup Poll.

Only 15... per cent supported the move, the same ratio which agreed that PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat is doing his best to combat Hamas.

The overwhelming majority in every demographic and geographic group — including those traditionally identifying with left-wing parties — supported making the talks conditional on "the PLO taking significant measures against Hamas and its leaders."

The telephone survey of 396 Hebrew-speaking Israelis was taken on Oct. 23, the day Foreign Minister Shimon Peres resumed talks with PLO officials in Cairo.

IPO To Tour China

TEL AVIV — The Israel Philharmonic Orchestra will perform two first-ever concerts in China this month during a tour of the Far East, the orchestra has announced.

The Asia tour, under the baton of orchestra director Zubin Mehta and with violinist Yitzhak Perlman performing as soloist, will open in Tokyo Nov. 6.

The first of the China concerts will be held in the 10,000-seat auditorium of the House of the People government building overlooking Tiananmen Square in Beijing on Nov. 23. The performance will be repeated in Shanghai the next day.

Tickets for the Beijing performance will be steep, costing up to $50 — the average monthly wage for a typical Chinese worker.

Because of the cost, the Chinese Broadcasting Authority will air the performance throughout the entire country

From China, the Israeli Philharmonic will travel on to India, where it will hold concerts in New Delhi on Nov. 27 and in conductor Mehta's native Bombay from Nov. 30 to Dec. 3.

Two More Arrests in Bus Bombing

JERUSALEM — Two more arrests were made last week in connection with the Oct. 19 bus bombing in Tel Aviv, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said.

"With regard to the attack in Tel Aviv, we know who [the perpetrators] are," he said. "Two of them are in our hands — one of whom gave [the suicide bomber] lodging before the operation. This one is not from Gaza."

The two arrested were Hassan Souwi, 25, the suicide bomber's brother, and his cousin Eid.

Some 10 to 15 Islamic activists in the Kalkilya area have been arrested over the past week, including Sheikh Abdel-Rahman Hamad, a former deportee, and Sheikh Anwar Marabeh, Palestinian sources said.

Vatican, PLO Establish Ties

VATICAN CITY — In a move that has been expected for some time, the Vatican last week established ties with the PLO.

"I don't think there is any negative element," said Avi Granot, counselor for church affairs at the Israeli embassy in Washington, noting that Israel itself has ties with the PLO.

"If anything, I can see the positive aspect of the Vatican having relations with everyone in the region and working toward the promotion of peace and friendship," Granot added.

Under the terms of the agreement, the PLO will open an office at the Holy See, and the apostolic nuncio in Tunisia will be responsible for contacts with PLO leaders.

The ties fall short of full diplomatic relations.

Precise Figures on French Children

PARIS — According to French Nazi hunter and lawyer Serge Klarsfeld, 11,104 Jewish children were arrested and deported from France to their deaths in Nazi extermination camps during World War II.

The figure appears in a book by Klarsfeld published last week and which contains the names and, in many cases, photographs of the young victims.

The book, Memorial to the Jewish Children Deported from France, was created with the help of Klarsfeld's organization, the Sons and Daughters of Jews Deported from France, and provides a close-up view of the deportations, even going so far as to provide the exact addresses where the Jewish children were arrested.

"This is not a book of death, but a book of life," Klarsfeld said. "It is as if the over 1,500 children photographed were testifying at the witness stand about the crimes committed against them."

Leaders thrown off balance by prospect of peace

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

The dominant faith of American Jewry is civil religion with its strong emphasis on identity: the people of Israel rather than the God of Israel.

Coupled with it is the belief that Jews everywhere, including Israel, are beleaguered by a hostile world that is waiting to finish what even Hitler did not accomplish.

Historically, there is, of course, good reason to fear the worst. But in our time the dread of impending doom is, mercifully, turning into a myth. Though we still have to face many dangers, imminent physical destruction is probably not one of them. The failure to see this may account for many of the surprisingly negative reactions to the peace process among Diaspora leaders.

Emil Fackenheim's oft-quoted formulation of "the 614th commandment" — to survive — which has had such a profound impact on contemporary Jewish life, has been — probably deliberately — misinterpreted by the exponents of civil religion to imply that it should take the place of most, if not all, of the other commandments. Many Jews have been prepared to break every mitzvah with a clean conscience, as long as they could persuade themselves that they were keeping this one.

Financial support for Israel became an important manifestation of Jewish civil religion. But the recent successes of the Jewish state, both economically and politically, have challenged the myth of its total vulnerability.

Though we need not be as cynical as those who assert that Diaspora Jewry needs enemies, preferably far away, to justify its priorities, there is little doubt that Jewish leaders in North America have been caught off balance by the prospect of peace in the Middle East. Despite a vociferous opposition, the Israeli public seems to be much more ready for it.

Tendency is to welcome critics of present government

Of course, it is possible that the peace scenario is unreal, and that we should beware of premature assumptions about a post-Oslo era in Jewish history. But the signs are there, and it is difficult to ignore them, whether we approve or not.

It is also possible that the present government of Israel is squandering the security of the state. But it is not easy to dismiss Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin — the great general, the seasoned diplomat and the experienced politician — as incompetent, irresponsible, or less patriotic than his opponents.

Yet, many leaders of Diaspora Jewry are doing precisely that. Though inhibited, so far at least, from calling Rabin a traitor, they are nevertheless distressed by the prospect of the destruction of the myth on which their leadership was founded. Hence the tendency to welcome every Israeli critic of the present government as an honored guest among us.

Geoffrey Paul, the former editor of The Jewish Chronicle of London and now its American correspondent, has written recently that "none sems to have been more surprised by the swift pace of events in the Middle East than the coalition of Jewish leadership represented in the Presidents' Conference, which having been taught by generations of Israeli governments to parrot its slogans about Arafat, the PLO and the Golan Heights, has found itself back-pedalling on deflated tires."

American Jewish leaders are ideologically confused and personally peeved. Though polls indicate that the majority of those whom they lead support Rabin's peace initiative, the leaders themselves do not always reflect it. Even if they are not on the right of the political spectrum, they often display remarkable and inexplicable lack of enthusiasm for current Israeli government policies.

When a representative body of American Jewry came out in favor of the peace process, Hirsh Goodman, the editor of The Jerusalem Report, wrote jokingly that "had it not, it may have had to fight the next war without Israel."

The situation in Canada is the same as in America, only more so. Not only do our leaders take their cues from the United States — despite their protestations to the contrary — but they have, on the whole, also been more intuitively hawkish than their American counterparts, partly because of the strong presence of Holocaust survivors in the two major centres of Canadian-Jewish life, and partly because Jews in Canada are one generation "behind" American Jewry in the process of acculturation. We seem to have a little more reason, and much more need, to identify enemies.

An additional complication has been the competition between Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith as to who is more zealous for Israel and Jewish dignity. Significantly, the tension is most acute in the Canada-Israel Committee.

The irony, though painful, should not escape the supporters of the peace effort. When the Likud government was in power and "peaceniks" in Canada were critical of its policy towards Arabs, many of their opponents accused them of disloyalty whenever they voiced criticisms. Today, when the situation is reversed, the erstwhile loyalties have suddenly lost their inhibitions and are not only critical of the government, but some even suggest that monies previously sent through the UJA or Bonds should now be given to the settlers' organization. Is this "situational loyalty"?

Apart from the political divisions and the personal confusions, there are also differences along denominational lines. Because Canadian Jewry is religiously more to "the right" than American Jewry, the mood here is likely to be more hawkish, or at least ostensibly prudently cautious. That is particularly so in the Orthodox community. Conservative congregations, in this as in so much else, often follow a similar pattern.

Reform Judaism, with its traditional liberal stance and Labor sympathies, has, on the whole, remained steadfast in its support for the peace process. But, as many Reform Jews are in the forefront of Jewish philanthropy — and thus Jewish leadership, a growing number of anti-Rabin voices are being heard also in Reform circles. It seems that liberalism is susceptible to expediency.

Money is always the currency of suppressed feelings, in communal affairs no less than in matrimonial disputes. Recognizing that they are neither wanted nor needed at present in Israel, many community leaders have turned their attention to the internal problems of the community, usually under the slogan of "continuity." The fact that the recession has starved our own institutions of funds has accentuated the need to work on the home front. That is the good news.

The bad news has been articulated, for example, by Barry Shrage, the head of Combined Jewish Philanthropies in Boston. In a Wall Street Journal article (Sept. 14), Shrage is quoted to have said that "by focusing so single-mindedly on Israel, American Jews have neglected to build a strong, unified religion and culture at home." The danger of a new kind of Diaspora isolationism is a grim prospect. To ignore the centrality of Israel is to jeopardize the Diaspora. If the term "continuity" becomes a code-word for not sending money to Israel, we have reason to be concerned and to see it as an oblique way of creating a deep rift.

The British equivalent of UJA has shown the way. It has decided to provide some $8 million to that country's continuity project. It probably suspects that otherwise its ability to raise money for Israel will be seriously impaired. The fundraisers, it appears, would rather share the fruits of their labor than lose them — and thereby their Jewish status as leaders — altogether.

Toronto has, of course, produced its own continuity report along similar lines.

If anybody needed ammunition to justify the indignation and the change of direction, Yossi Beilin, deputy foreign minister of Israel, provided it when he is reported to have said that Israel doesn't need Diaspora money, especially when it is being sent through the Jewish Agency.

But Beilin is also saying that Zionism needs an ideological framework. Having been overshadowed for so long by philanthropy, it has lost its bearings. Now, when philanthropy is no longer the same dominant force it once was, Zionism proper needs to be heard again.

An interesting contribution towards a new partnership, not inconsistent with Beilin's proposal, has been made in a recent paper by Dan Bevly, a Tel Aviv accountant, and his colleague Eliahu Salpeter. They argue that now, when money from the Diaspora is no longer the primary concern, Israel should provide human resources to strengthen Jewish life — in the Diaspora.

They write: "If the past has guidance for the future, Jewish history offers us a fundamental lesson: from ancient times there has been a repeated shift of life-giving Jewish creativity between the Land of Israel and the most flourishing centre in the Diaspora. Has the time come for the focus to shift back to Israel?"

The answer may very well be yes. Having given Israelis money in recent years, and thereby helped to establish our own identity as Jews, the time may have come for us to get some content from our Israeli siblings. God knows we need it. If it comes about, it could lead to a happy outcome of the current potential crisis.

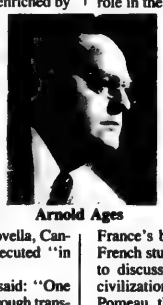
Voltaire was an anti-Semite

By ARNOLD AGES

This year (Nov. 21) France and the civilized world in general celebrate the 300th anniversary of the birth of Francois Marie Arouet, better known as Voltaire.

Voltaire dominated Europe and 18th century France both chronologically (he lived until 1778) and intellectually. As the self-appointed chief of the philosophes, that band of French intellectuals who sought to bring enlightenment to France and the continent, Voltaire carried the battle against all the forces of coercive religion, political reaction and political obscurantism in his country.

The good news is that French literature and civilization have been immeasurably enriched by Voltaire's contribution to history, theatre, poetry, short stories and journalism. And he was far more than a writer; Voltaire was an activist who fought religious intolerance, national chauvinisms, and obscure philosophical systems.



Arnold Ages

As a stylist in French prose, Voltaire had probably no equal in his century. He had the gift of being able to sum up the human condition with pithy maxims. "People who believe in absurdities," he said, "will eventually commit atrocities." In his great novella, Candide, he has an English admiral executed "in order to encourage the others."

Of the metier of the translator he said: "One should not try to get to know a poet through translations; that's like trying to see color in an engraving."

Perhaps the most famous quotation commonly attributed to Voltaire — "I disagree with you but I will fight to the death to preserve your right to say what you believe," — has the ring of Voltairean truth but no textual source for the quotation has ever been found.

So powerful was Voltaire's prose that, according to an 18th century maxim, kings who feared no mortal power, trembled when confronted with Voltaire's pen.

It has been said that without Voltaire there would never have been a French revolution. That is an exaggeration. Voltaire was a radical but he was also a conservative. He sought change and reform in France's prison system and in its political and economic structures, but he saw those changes coming through evolution and the spread of advanced ideas — not through bloody insurrection.

Although critical of the monarchy, Voltaire was a monarchist who believed in the sanctity of the crown. One of the reasons for Voltaire's conservatism can be seen in his private carnets (notebooks) in which he recorded his incredibly successful business transactions in real estate and finance. He was also one of the few French writers in the 18th century who made money from his art.

The good news about Voltaire, one of France's "immortals," must be balanced, however, by the bad news. He was a snob who looked down upon the masses as ignorant peasants who deserved no role in the life of his nation; he was also a bigot who entertained racist ideas about blacks which would have endeared him to the Ku Klux Klan. In his plays, journalism and historical essays he often presented a cruelly caricatured portrait of Muslims and of Islam.

And he was an unrepentant anti-Semite. This blemish on his reputation does not, of course, sit well with apologists for Voltaire.

Several months ago on the French television series Apostrophes, Bernard Pivot, the amiable host of one of France's best programs, assembled a group of French students and three specialists on Voltaire to discuss the latter's contribution to French civilization. One of the students asked René Pomeau, the dean of Voltaire experts in France, why Voltaire, so highly touted as a progressive thinker, was an anti-Semite.

Pomeau parried the question by attempting to correct the student. Voltaire, he said was against Judaism as a religion but was not anti-Semitic in the ordinary sense of the word. Unfortunately, Pomeau fudged the truth. Voltaire was against Judaism (a religion which he hardly understood) but he was also an anti-Semite who used his not inconsiderable prestige to denigrate both the religion and the mores of the Jewish people.

Pomeau's cosmetizing of the truth about Voltaire has been a staple of French literary history for almost a century. Generations of students have been told that Voltaire's hostility to Judaism was a stratagem he used to attack the Catholic Church. Since Christianity was founded on Judaism, Voltaire could, in this scenario, attack Christianity indirectly by targeting Jews, Judaism and the Hebrew Bible — all of this with impunity. Thus he could sap the religious authencity of the Church by demolishing its shaky Jewish foundation.

There is some truth to this thesis, as Mark Twain would say — mostly. But it is not the whole truth. Having re-read the major portion of Voltaire's collected works once again recently, I have come to the reluctant but painful conclusion that Voltaire crosses the line between anti-Judaism and anti-Semitism so frequently that these distinctions, so beloved by the establishment French critics like Pomeau, evaporate.

The zeal and frequency with which Voltaire assaults Jews and Judaism (it would be participating in the obscenity to reproduce Voltaire's coarse anti-Semitic diatribes) show clearly that those attacks are not merely vehicles for his argument against Christianity. They are part of the medieval legacy of Church-inspired hatred of Jews which Voltaire, despite his broad-minded philosophical stance, grafted instinctively onto his prose.

There is also a personal factor in the fractured equation which produces Voltaire's anti-Semitism. On two occasions, once in London during a youthful sojourn in the English capital and once in Berlin in the 1750s, where he was hosted by King Frederick the Great, Voltaire had unpleasant financial transactions with Jewish businessmen. He never forgot the ignominy of these encounters, one of which compromised his friendship with Frederick.

In his published works and in his voluminous correspondence, Voltaire refers constantly to the wretchedness of these Jewish "scoundrels" who had made his life so miserable. Like all anti-Semites Voltaire generalized his hatred of two Jews to all Jews. I believe he retrojected a combination of his own personal prejudices against Jews and the traditional Catholic teaching of contempt for Jews onto the Hebrew Bible and its heroes.

Three hundred years after his birth, Voltaire remains, despite the indelible taint of his anti-Semitism, a major spiritual ancestor of the democratic ethos which we all enjoy in western society.

Arnold Ages, professor of French at the University of Waterloo, has published two books and more than 30 scholarly articles on Voltaire.

A mighty leap

King Hussein put it best. "This," he said of Jordan's ratified peace treaty with Israel, "is our gift to our peoples and to generations to come."

Under the glare of a broiling desert sun last week, Israel and Jordan took a mighty leap forward, putting behind them nearly five decades of suspicion, fear and bloodshed.

Approved by the Knesset by an overwhelming majority, the agreement promises to be mutually beneficial and warm. Aptly enough, King Hussein described it as "the peace of the committed."

According to the text of the accord, the two nations will exchange resident ambassadors within a month, paving the way for economic and cultural relations. Tourism will soon blossom, turning the desolate Arava into a valley of peaceful coexistence and plenty.

In all probability, this treaty — Israel's second with an Arab country — will be warmer than Israel's 1979 treaty with Egypt. And there is hope that Israel's rapprochement with Jordan will encourage more Arab nations to enter into diplomatic relations with Israel. Significantly, the representatives of eight Islamic countries attended last week's historic ceremony in the Arava. As expected, Egypt, Morocco and Tunisia, all of which have ties with Israel, sent emissaries. In addition, officials from Oman, Qatar, Algeria, Mauritania and Malaysia were present.

But even on this auspicious occasion, there was a discordant, threatening note from the rejectionist front. Hezbollah forces in southern Lebanon shelled the northern Galilee. And in East Jerusalem, Hamas and the PLO, each for their own reason, called a general strike to protest the treaty. Hamas is extremely opposed to any development which fortifies Israel's existence and legitimizes its presence in the region, while the PLO was angered by a clause in the agreement which recognizes Jordan's special role as guardian of Muslim holy places in Jerusalem.

Not surprisingly, President Bill Clinton's talks with President Hafez al-Assad in Damascus were rather inconclusive. Assad suggested, as he has previously done, that he is ready to make peace with Israel under certain conditions. But regretfully, he downplayed the importance of meeting Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin face to face, and scoffed at the idea of offering confidence-building gestures to the Israeli people.

The peace process has taken flight, but turbulence still lies ahead.

Righteous Gentiles

Recognizing the good deeds of gentiles towards Jews during the Holocaust is a meritorious exercise and one which is consistent with the Hebrew dictum hakarat hatov (expressing gratitude).

The State of Israel has taken the lead in this regard with its Avenue of the Righteous dedicated to gentile rescuers of Jews. It has also conferred honorary Israeli citizenship on gentile rescuers whose exceptional acts of heroism saved Jews.

In 1990, at the first international conference of Hidden Children held in New York City, a special session was set aside to honor more than a dozen Dutch, French and Belgian individuals who had risked their lives to save Jews from the Nazis.

Highlighting the deeds of the virtuous few stands out in prominent relief against the back-drop of the majority populations of Europe who, during the Holocaust, were indifferent at best or hostile at worst towards Jewish fate. But 50 years after the liberation of the death camps, it is the emphasis on isolated virtue that occupies our concerns. Evidence of this preoccupation, suggests Diana Jean Schemo (New York Times, June 4) may be seen in Schindler's List, the publication of Samuel Oliner's The Altruistic Personality and academic conferences on the Holocaust in Europe and America, which ignore the barbarism of the Nazis in order to concentrate on side issues.

The time, therefore, may have come for the injection of some necessary perspective. Schemo is undoutedly correct when she notes that while survivors "live to tell their stories of the kindly farmer, or of the neighbor who hid a hunted family, there is nobody left to speak in the voice of the millions who could find no haven."

Claude Lanzmann, whose Shoah is still the most authentic film document on the Holocaust, shares this view. He notes paradoxically that neither survivors nor their rescuers can relate the full tale. "There is an essential contradiction in telling the story through the eyes of the living when the essence of the Holocaust was industrialized slaughter." Lanzmann also suggests that an over-emphasis on isolated goodness not only distorts historical reality but gives "fodder to revisionists and moral relativists."

There is some truth to the arguments advanced by Schemo and Lanzmann but they are too hard on the survivors. The latter do not, in general, claim to tell the whole story but only the small part which they occupied on the concentric circle of Hitler's hell. Nor do they assert that they are the voice of the martyred millions. They are simple witnesses, some eloquent, some less than eloquent — but all messengers from a tragic Jewish past who speak in their own voices about the absolutes of evil and good which intersected their lives.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

NOBEL PEACE PRIZE

If Mr. Yasser Arafat is awarded the Peace Prize, then we should not discriminate against people like President Hafez al-Assad of Syria, Libyan leader Muammar Khadafi, Saddam Hussein of Iraq, Gerry Adams of the IRA and Mohammed Farrah Aidid of Somalia. The list is endless.

NOT REINSTATED

In the Oct. 13 The CJN article regarding the JCC, my name was published in such a manner as to imply to your readership that I have been reinstated as a staff member of the now-named Bathurst Jewish Centre, formerly the JCC, formerly the YM & YWHA.

On August 25, I received my notice of immediate dismissal along with 30 other employees. They, as well as I, were given no advance notice or explanation. Like them I received no severance, no sick benefits or vacation pay. I also lost all group life and medical insurance benefits.

After 36 years of continuous service I felt very distressed and angry. To put the record straight, I am not on staff at the Centre, I have not been reinstated to staff, and like the 30 other terminated employees, I must manage my life under great financial stress.

Rabbi Plaut in his excellent article Oct. 20 mentioned that some staff members have been reinstated. I don't know of any, and feel this kind of misinformation, however unintentional, only leads to further clouding of reality.

It is true that the Koffler Centre School of Dance is continuing to operate. This is as a result of the teachers forming a collective and agreeing to collaborate for the purpose of maintaining one of the finest schools of its kind in Canada.

THE REAL CRISIS

On Sept. 17, Sir Karl Popper, one of the greatest philosophers of our era, died. He was one of an illustrious roster of Jews who converted voluntarily to Christianity in this century: Amnesty International founder Peter Henenson, mathematical giant John von Neumann, philosophers Mortimer Adler and Eugen Rosenstock-Huessy, sociologist Peter Berger, Bishop Hugh Montefiore of England, Cardinal Jean-Marie Lustiger of France and former New York gubernatorial candidate Lewis Lehman.

This doesn't include the even greater number of elite Jews who have been enraptured by the humanity and personality of Jesus, people like poet Joseph Brodsky, futurist Barbara Marx Hubbard, George Steiner, Bob Dylan, Sir Yehudi Menuhin, writer Boris Pasternak and mystic Simone Weil. The leading intellectual Jewish magazine in North America, Tikkun published (January/February 1992) a paean to Jesus by a Jew, which would have been unthinkable a few years ago.

Why then the obsession with Jesus cults when we Jews face a far greater crisis? The number of followers of these puerile hybrids are exaggerated and insignificant as compared to those who abandon Judaism. Thus the horrifying intermarriage rate, their attraction to the spirituality and teachings of the New Testament, such as the Sermon on the Mount, and their affinity to the intellectualism of Buddhism.

The solutions are Jewish education and a meaningful dialogue among Judaism's three main branches on rescuing the mass of alienated Jews. Then again, supplanting the hostility, if not hatred, among many of them is a utopian dream. Yitzhak Rabin has shaken hands with the archterrorist Yasser Arafat, but a chassidic rebbe would not deign to make peace with a Reform rabbi.

WARPED PRIORITY

In her letter of Oct. 20, Eva Goldfinger indicates that the first priority of the Jewish Federation should be to support the local Jewish needy, and the second priority should be to promote "Jewish culture."

She indicates that the private religious day or afternoon/weekend schools should be supported by their users and benefactors, i.e., that they should not be entitled to Federation funds.

One can only hope the Federation would not take Mrs. Goldfinger's warped priorities seriously. It is only by ensuring a solid Jewish education for our youth that we have any hope in guaranteeing Jewish survival and continuity to future generations.

Certainly we must take care of the Jewish needy, but a very high Federation priority must always be the support of the educational institutions of our city.

CAMP RAMAH ISSUE

We were astonished to learn from the Oct. 13 The CJN that the summer 1994 issue of Ramah: The Magazine has been withheld from Canadian Ramah families because it included an article about female camp alumnae who are now conservative rabbis and cantors.

As active members of a Canadian Conservative synagogue and parents of Ramah campers, we are only too aware that the Conservative movement in Canada is more "traditional" when it comes to egalitarianism than its American counterpart, and that Ramah Canada has no fully egalitarian minyan (despite the fact that a high percentage of campers are American).

This is a situation that we deplore and are working hard to change. For families like us, it is a matter of some encouragement to be reminded occasionally that the American branch of the Conservative movement is indeed egalitarian. Such reminders offer some hope that change can occur in Canada as well.

Is the point of withholding the magazine to avoid offending more traditional and Orthodox supporters of Ramah Canada for fear of losing their financial support?

Surely the Canadian office of Ramah realizes that Conservative and Orthodox Jews in Canada are well aware that the American Conservative movement ordains women and that there are conservative women rabbis and cantors in American synagogues.

Is there a fear that Orthodox families may cease sending their girls to Ramah lest they follow in the footsteps of the alumnae featured in the article?

Surely the choice to send a child to a Conservative camp suggests parents do not feel overly threatened by the nature of the religious activities at that camp or by other aspects of the movement by which that camp is sponsored.

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

Around the beginning of October, the New York Times published a piece by Roger Cohen, sent from Sarajevo in embattled Bosnia. It was entitled, Bosnian Foes Gaze at History's Mirror and See a Jew. Strange as it may seem, in this complex and multi-faceted political and religious conflict the Jews have become a paradigm.

In the former Yugoslavia, no people have been put more heavily on trial than Bosnia's Muslims. In addition to physical abuse and danger, they face a serious identity crisis, which led one of them to say:

"We have many similarities to the Jewish people. We must learn self-sufficiency and prepare for a long struggle. Before this war there were 27 mosques in Banja Luja — now there are none. Banja Luja is our Jerusalem. The Jews fought 2000 years for Jerusalem. My lifetime is nothing in this struggle."

Cohen comments: "For the Muslims of Bosnia, the comparison stems from the notion of an identity lost or diluted . . . that is then recovered through struggle. This struggle, in turn, involves a realization of the need for self-defense. Bosnian leaders now repeatedly say it was an error to expect outside help when Muslims were being killed in large numbers by the Serbs in 1992."

Rabbi Plaut

They then draw the parallel with Jewish deaths in the Holocaust. The lesson for them is: We must learn to fight alone because nobody will help us.

But the Serbs, too, invoke the history of the Jews. They see striking parallels between themselves and us — two small misunderstood peoples that have suffered greatly but remain true to their ideals.

"During World War II, both Serbs and Jews were persecuted with equal savagery by a puppet Nazi regime in Croatia, and were placed in the same concentration camps." (Incidentially, it is well to remember that the Serbs protected Jews, while the Croats generally persecuted them with vim and vigor.)

Here is Cohen's last paragraph which sums up his article:

"Croatia — whose leader, Mr. Tudjman, has apologized to the Jews for past anti-Semitic writings — now claim to be interested chiefly in peaceful solutions. But it remains striking that at a time when Jews and Palestinians have looked each other in the eye at last, the peoples of former Yugoslavia are using Jewish history to turn away from each other and cement the illusions necessary to fight a war whose fiercest exchanges in Sarajevo have often been, and remain, across the front line of the old Jewish cemetery."

Reading this article brought to mind an experience I had a quarter of a century ago. It was the time when the media brought us day after day the faces of starving Biafran children — Biafra being a secessionist province of Nigeria, with which it was embroiled in a bitter civil war. I was persuaded to go to Biafra and see for myself the extent of the suffering, so that on my return I could help to stimulate Canadian generosity.

I eventually arrived in Biafra, after making circuitous routes and landing on a blacked-out little air strip in the middle of the night, only to be shot at by dive-bombing MiGs. (I found out to my surprise that I still remembered the technique acquired in World War II to dive into the nearest ditch).

What remains now most clearly in my memory is the way in which the Biafrans — surrounded by a vastly superior Nigerian force — looked at themselves. They did not know what a rabbi was and they knew very little about Jews, but they knew a lot about Israel. "We are Africa's Israelis," they said, "and we are fighting for our identity."

Finally, in a little journal called Akili, the journal of African-Canadian Studies, I found this paragraph in an article by Owen Rowe about a celebration which his church had recently held: "Its purpose was to remind us of who we are; from where we have come; and to instil in ourselves and our children pride and self-confidence in our heritage." Mr. Rowe did not mention the Jews as an example, but the parallel struck me as compelling.

Golan Heights must not be given away

By ARIEL SHARON
The Jerusalem Post

Israel is being asked to relinquish strategic assets while Syria grows stronger

It isn't their homes or personal futures that the people on the Golan Heights are concerned about. They are fighting for the lives of the country's northern residents and the future of the state of Israel. They are fighting for Israel's ability to go on existing securely, with or without peace.

It isn't enough to be "with the Golan," as the slogans have it. The motto needs to be: "The Golan must not be given up."

Why?

• The Syrians have attacked Israel without provocation three times. And for 19 years, up to the Six Day War, they waged a costly and unceasing war of attrition against the Jordan Valley and Hula Valley communities, causing many casualties. Again, there was no Israeli provocation.

All things considered, it's a small price.

• Thirty per cent of the water Israel uses comes from the Golan and Lebanon's Beka'a Valley. This is a question of life and death for Israel.

As far back as 1964, the Syrians, together with other Arab states, attempted to divert the waters of the Jordan's sources and prevent us from using this water. This Syrian diversion project signaled the beginning of the deterioration which ultimately led to the Six Day War.

• Syria, having occupied Lebanon, now rules there. (The Syrians say they were "invited" in, but that doesn't change the fact of their military presence in the country.) Syria's presence in Lebanon harms our strategic position on our northern border.

The Syrian army is growing ever more powerful, and in unprecedented proportions. It now has close to 5,000 tanks and about 1,000 ground-to-ground missiles with a range of 40-300 miles. Many of these are capable of delivering chemical warheads.

Israelis would do well to remember the damage that just 39 Iraqi Scuds were able to inflict. They ought to recall the tension, if not outright panic, that gripped the nation. Now, Israel is being asked to give up strategic assets that will weaken it, while Syria grows stronger.

• Damascus knows that the immense proliferation of its military power will allow it to make marked territorial gains that Israel would find very difficult to reverse. It could achieve this acting alone, especially if it launches a surprise attack, as it did in 1973, and if it is reinforced by Iraq, as in previous wars, or Iran.

All this holds while the Israel Defence Force is still on the Golan, and in front of its deployment stands one of the deepest, most formidable obstacle systems on earth. It was constructed 20 years ago and maintained to this day because during the Yom Kippur War Israel realized that the Golan, even in its entirety, lacks the minimal depth necessary to prevent an enemy land breakthrough into eastern Galilee.

Any withdrawal on the Golan means relinquishing that obstacle system, without which - even today - the IDF has no real chance of repelling a surprise Syrian attack. Losing that obstacle system and our strategic depth means losing the army's ability to prevent the Syrian army penetrating west of the Jordan and occupying all or most of eastern Galilee.

A concession in the Golan like the one the prime minister has already agreed to means that the government, backed by the IDF general staff, is prepared to sacrifice Israel's security for the sake of a peace treaty.

Once such a peace exists, Israel's continued existence or destruction will, in effect, depend more on the good will, or absence of it, of the Syrian dictator than on the IDF or the wisdom of its commanders.

"But there will be peace," say the supporters of concessions. "Who will need strategic assets?"

They should be told that we live in a constantly changing world. For instance, until 15 years ago, Iran was Israel's main ally in the Middle East. Overnight, it became Israel's most dangerous enemy.

Who can guarantee that Islamic extremists won't take over Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan or Algeria? The whole Middle East is a boiling cauldron. And who knows how Assad's successors will behave?

One doesn't make such a dangerous move just for the sake of four more years of political power. One must have a sense of responsibility; unfortunately, the government seems to lack it.

The fashion is to want everything American-style. Indeed, it would be a good thing were Israel to adopt America's responsible approach to its national security.

Americans don't rely on peace agreements, or on the other side's pronouncements or intentions. They repeatedly stress that their point of departure is the enemy's capabilities. What concerns them is what the enemy is able to do if all estimates prove wrong, or if the situation changes.

In our place, the Americans would never retreat from the Golan. "Don't scare us," say the supporters of withdrawal. My reply: "Don't endanger us. You have no right to do so.

How to survive a kiddie birthday party

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

My next door neighbors, my husband and I have just thrown a 15-hour "sleep-over" birthday party for our 8-year-old daughters, and lived to tell the tale. In fact, my neighbor's husband said that we fulfilled all the criteria for a successful kiddie party: no trips to the emergency room, no hysterics, no fist fights. It's a minimal list of achievements, but I'll take it.

The 15 guests (all the girls in their third grade class) arrived at just after Sabbath, at about 9 p.m. Saturday night. They promptly inhaled two gigantic kosher, double-cheese pizzas right down to the crusts and set up their sleeping bags in the family room, which we had carpeted wall to wall with mattresses and sofa cushions. The first movie put a few girls to sleep. Halfway through the second movie, most of the others passed out, too.

Gazing over the sea of sleeping — and thus extremely well behaved — children, I told my neighbors that, since it was 1 a.m., I thought it was safe for them to go home. I told my teenage niece, who was there to help, that she could go to bed. I was sure, I said, that the rest of the second movie would send the few sturdy, awake survivors to dreamland.

At 2 a.m., the movie ended and three moppets remained in action, chorusing, "We can't sleep." One wanted her stuffed animal; I found one of ours that served. One wanted to get off the floor, I tucked here in on the living room couch. The last wanted, in no particular priority order, her mother, a snack, a drink, something to read, and 100 shares of a preferred blue chip stock.

Erica Meyer Rauzin

I instantly discarded the idea of calling her mother, a devoted parent who would never have recovered from a 2 a.m. phone call. After all, the child wasn't upset, she was just being extremely adept at obtaining massive amounts of pre-dawn attention. My idea of a 2 a.m. snack for recalcitrant children is a slice of bread and a glass of milk, but bribery demands stronger stuff, so I gave her soda and chocolates. I added a stack of Archie comic books and she read herself to sleep in no time at all, still clutching her candies, having once again triumphed over the grownup world.

I thought that I should be the first one up in the morning, so I set the alarm for seven. No luck. I came in about eighth or ninth. When I stepped out of my bedroom, half the party was sleeping and half the party was cozily huddling amidst the sleeping bags, trying to decide which movie to watch.

My neighbor came over early to help. We toasted a stack of waffles and put out orange juice and an array of sprinkles, spreads, sauces, and whipped cream, so the girls could build their own breakfasts. Little kids can consume an awful lot of chocolate syrup and rainbow sprinkles early in the morning. And fast, too. It's a marvel to see.

We had planned a series of relay races we thought would keep them busy for a couple of hours: an egg-and-spoon race, a wheelbarrow race, a three-legged race, a sack race, and a wonderfully comic exercise called a costume race. Each team gets a costume: baggy vest, floppy hat, big skirt and high heel shoes. The first girl puts on the costume, runs to the base and returns, flinging off the costume so the next girl can put it on and run. This is pretty funny to watch (just come by and see the video tape) but, alas, the whole thing took about 25 minutes.

There we were, at 9:45 a.m., with 15 little kids dependent upon us for entertainment and activity. Their mothers weren't coming to get them until 11 and all we had left to offer was birthday cake.

My niece solved part of the problem. A whiz with hair, she lined the girls up so she could give each one an intricate, fancy braided hairdo (as well as a new comb of her very own). The kids solved the rest of the problem: they wanted to watch the movies again.

When 11 finally came, they were sticky with birthday cake, bug-eyed from watching so many movies, and adorned with French-braided, ribbon-laced hairdos that would be perfectly appropriate for their senior prom (and that were anchored with enough mousse to last that long).

So what if their mothers would have to immerse them in their bathtubs for an hour each to melt off the sugar and dissolve the hairdos? We had fulfilled the final criteria for a great birthday party: our daughters were happy and, hey, we never had to call an ambulance.

Waldheim affair left its mark

Reporting from Vienna, Sheldon Kirshner looks at the Jewish community in Austria.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The Waldheim affair has basically run its course, but for many Jews in Austria, it still resonates.

Some people in the community, such as Chief Rabbi Paul Eisenberg, try to repress the incident. "I really forgot it," he says, putting up a brave front. But most Jews here seem doomed to relive the trauma when the topic is brought up by a foreigner visiting Austria.

Three months before his election, Waldheim — the former two-term United Nations secretary-general — was rudely jolted by grave accusations that he had covered up details of his service in the Wehrmacht during World War II. The World Jewish Congress in New York City, the chief finger pointer, suggested that Waldheim's hands were less than clean because, as an intelligence officer in the Balkans, he had taken part in military operations against civilians, including Greek Jews.

What happened next is described by Anton Pelinka, a professor of political science at Innsbruck University and director of the Institute of Conflict Research in Vienna.

A number of Waldheim's supporters — particularly those in the conservative People's party — launched a campaign reeking of anti-Semitic undertones against his detractors. Inevitably, Austria's Jewish community — nearly destroyed by the Nazis — was caught up in the shrill, divisive debate. When the dust finally settled, the Jewish community had been more or less traumatized.

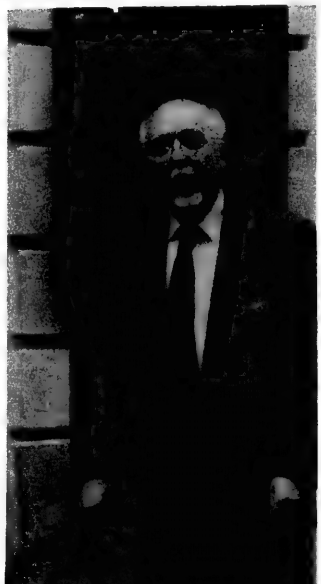
Pelinka, a Catholic, believes the Waldheim affair had negative and positive aspects. "Psychologically, it made Jews feel more vulnerable, less integrated, though the situation has improved of late. I'm sure it's extremely complex to be a Jew in Austria."

But due to the seemingly endless debates revolving around Waldheim (who retired two years ago), the Austrian roots of anti-Semitism, and its continuing existence, were highlighted. Furthermore, Austria was finally brought face to face with its Nazi past. As a result, Pelinka explains, post-war Austria "lost its innocence," and anti-Semitism became "a problem with which Austrian politicians and academics were forced to grapple."

To Richard Mitten, an American history professor at the University of Vienna and author of The Politics of Anti-Semitic Prejudice: The Waldheim Phenomenon in Austria, the affair produced a climate of uncertainty and a sense of fear and intimidation among Jews.

"The anti-Semitic threshold was lowered. You didn't know who your friends were."

Yet, with the passage of time, the affair had a salutary effect. It compelled Austrians to accept the unpalatable fact that Austria was not merely a victim of German aggression in 1938, but also a willing participant in Nazi crimes during the Holocaust.



Paul Grosz. [Sheldon Kirshner photos]

And, Mitten points out, it persuaded the younger generation of Jews to act more militantly, to take a greater interest in their Jewish heritage and to be less tolerant of implicit anti-Semitism.

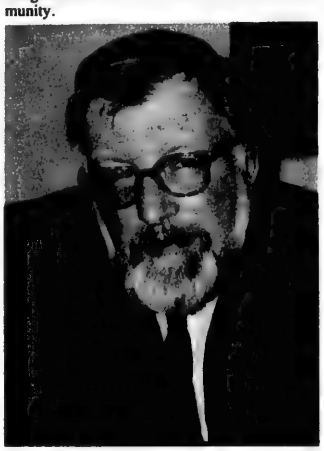
The affair, he observes, exposed the children and grandchildren of survivors to the bitter reality of "anti-Semitism from above, something they had never seen." And it brought heretofore estranged Jews out from the cold and into the community.



Avshalom Hodik

During the height of the recriminations, he adds, he gained the disconcerting impression that his non-Jewish neighbors identified him "solely as a Jew," not as an Austrian. And this left its mark. As he puts it: "I've seldom heard Austrian Jews refer to Austria as 'my country.' I wish I could feel like an Austrian Jew with less compunction."

To Avshalom Hodik, executive director of the community, the affair had a lasting impact. "People woke up and realized that their dream of being fully integrated was just a dream. It made Jews feel more like Jews. I consider this a beneficial outcome. It made the community more tight-knit."

* * *

Today, the community is but a shadow of its pre-war self.

Before Germany's annexation in 1938, Austria's Jewish population was about 200,000, concentrated in Vienna, the lively, cosmopolitan capital.

Their contribution to Austrian — and international — culture, science and jurisprudence was immense. Their names still conjure up visions of intellectual fecundity — Sigmund Freud, Arnold Schoenberg, Gustav Mahler, Bruno Walter, Stefan Zweig, Joseph Roth, Lise Meitner, Hans Kelsen and Arthur Schnitzler, among others.

But in the wake of Germany's annexation of Austria, and Austrians' fervid embrace of Nazism, the Jewish community was harassed, humiliated, disenfranchised, impoverished and pushed out. Virtually all those unable to leave were deported to death camps. Approximately 65,000 Austrian Jews perished in the inferno of the Holocaust.

Following the war, Austria, occupied by Allied armies, became an important transit point for Holocaust survivors en route to Palestine/Israel, North America and elsewhere.

Today, there are 7,500 registered Jews in the country, residing in Vienna, Linz, Graz, Salsburg and Innsbruck. Another 5,000 or so are not registered.

Few, like Grosz, are of Austrian origin. Most are from Central and Eastern Europe and the old Soviet Union. A handful are Iranians.

Thanks to the influx of 2,000 to 3,000 Soviet Jews in recent years, the community has experienced a measure of growth. But since the passage of restrictive asylum and residency laws in 1992 and 1993, the Soviet tide has all but been stemmed, according to Hodik.

"It's almost impossible for them to enter Austria. They can if they're able to prove they've been persecuted. Serious immigration has just about stopped."

Without a fresh infusion, the community may well decline. The latest yearly statistics, supplied by Rabbi Eisenberg, reveal 75 births, 150 deaths, 25 marriages and 25 bar mitzvahs. As of December 1993, 1,700 of its members were between the ages of 40 and 60, while 1,585 were 60 to 80 years old. More than one-third were pensioners.

Aliyah remains negligible, even though community subsidies are available to poorer members interested in relocating to Israel.

By and large, it is a traditional community, with a network of synagogues, schools, yeshivahs, clubs, organizations and kosher restaurants, bakeries and butchers. "There is a complete infrastructure," notes Hodik. "We have all you can imagine."

Reform Judaism is a thin reed in Austria. A progressive community, Ohr Chadash, was established four years ago. And while it has 150 members, it possesses neither a synagogue nor a permanent rabbi, according to Linda Kneucker, an American expatriate married to an Austrian.

Although Ohr Chadash receives funds from the World Union of Progressive Jewry, it is not financially viable, and is therefore ineligible for federal government recognition.

The Chabad movement, which is fairly strong here, has threatened to withdraw from the Israelitschen Kultusgemeinde Wien — the official religious community — should Ohr Chadash be admitted. Meanwhile, 90 per cent of Ohr Chadash's congregants belong to the Israelitschen Kultusgemeinde, but as individuals.

"It's not a pleasant situation," concedes Rabbi Eisenberg. "I have nothing against Ohr Chadash in principle." However, in the interest of unity, he claims, has no choice but to withhold official recognition.

Although the community has real estate holdings throughout Vienna — some 60 buildings which were returned after the war — it is running a deficit of about $1 million (US) annually. "We owe the banks $8 to $10 million," laments Hodik. "We're financially hard put."

There is a plan to eliminate the deficit within five to 10 years. But operating costs are constantly rising. And since 1986 — when the affair broke — the community has been compelled to spend about $1 million per year on security measures.

There are anti-Semitic incidents, to be sure. But Rabbi Yaacov Biderman, the Chabad representative here, contends that anti-Semitism is "not the real problem. Our real problem is assimilation." The intermarriage rate, he claims, is "extremely high."

Another drain on community coffers is the need for imported teachers. "We're dependent on teachers from Israel," says Hodik, "and it's an expensive proposition." The community is simply too small to generate its own corps of teachers.

Despite these problems, the consensus is that the community is on a solid footing.

Rabbi Paul Eisenberg

"In the last 15 years, there has been a complete change of attitude among Jews," says Hodik. "People are no longer sitting on their suitcases."

In his view, the majority of Jews consider Austria their home, although they tend to classify themselves as "Jews in Austria" rather than as "Austrian Jews."

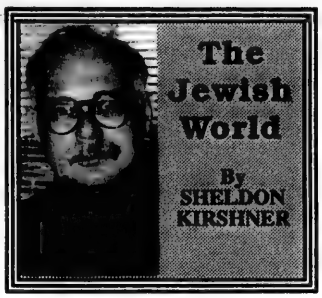
Dana Teichner, a 20-year-old law student at the University of Vienna and president of the Jewish Students' Movement, typifies this mindset. "The first thing is that I am a Jew. The second thing is that I live in Austria. I feel comfortable here, but I'm not sure I want to stay."

Rabbi Eisenberg has the last word.

"I'm not saying that Vienna is the best place in the world for Jews to live. Israel is. But Austria is definitely not the worst place."

He adds: "It's simply not true, as some American Jews claim, that Austria is a centre of anti-Semitism."

Looking ahead, he exudes optimism. "We have a good future. Austria won't be a hub of Judaism. But we have schools and institutions. Maybe the community won't flourish, but we'll do fine."



Jottings from a notebook...

The subject is restitution payments. The prognosis is promising.

Austria's Jewish community and the Austrian government are deep into negotiations whose outcome could be a windfall for upwards of 30,000 former Austrian Jews living abroad, including Canada.

"Their claims have yet to be met," said Avshalom Hodik, executive director of Vienna's Jewish community.

Paul Grosz, president of the community, is optimistic that the talks will reach a successful conclusion. He offers this prediction in the full knowledge that some Austrians grouse that Jews have been "extraordinarily well taken care of and pampered" by the government.

Gerda Themel-Sterk, the person in charge of Jewish affairs in Chancellor Franz Vranitzky's office, is also sanguine that the discussions will yield positive results. And it wouldn't surprise her if an official announcement is made to that effect next year on the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II in Europe.

Themel-Sterk, who was appointed last May, urges former Jewish citizens of Austria to contact her. The address: Bundeskanzleramt, Hohenstaufengasse 3, A-1010, Vienna.

The common assumption, especially in North America, is that Adolf Hitler was born in Linz, Upper Austria. He was actually born in Braunau, an Austrian border town along the Inn River not too far from Linz. The year was 1889.

I spent nearly eight hours in Braunau in late June, wandering through its cobblestone streets, gazing upon the house where Hitler was born, and asking a variety of residents, from the mayor down, how they felt about living in a place stigmatized by its most infamous son.

Restitution payments

During the course of my visit, I chatted with Stefan Hoffer, the parish priest at the handsome Gothic church where some of Braunau's official records are stored. On an impulse, I asked Father Hoffer whether I could see Hitler's birth certificate. He nodded his head, rose and returned with a decaying tome containing a record of births from June 1881 to December 1891.

Flipping through mouldy pages, he suddenly stopped, pointing his finger at several lines of crabbed handwriting. There it was — the official registry of his birth, accompanied by a typewritten entry stapled over it.

The persons born immediately before and after Hitler were Rudolf Josef Chleborat and Theresia Grabmayer. What, I wondered, had they done with their lives?

Normally, Father Hoffer informed me, he does not show visitors the registration book. I felt somewhat privileged. But when I asked him whether I could photograph the heavy volume, he demurred, saying he needed permission from his bishop.

Father Hoffer is neither ashamed nor bothered by Braunau's association with Hitler. "I have no problem with it. It's an historical fact." However, he is troubled when neo-Nazis converge on Braunau to mark Hitler's birthday.

Theodor Herzl, the founder of modern political Zionism, was born in Budapest and grew up in Vienna. After studying law there, he gravitated toward journalism. Eventually, he was appointed the Paris correspondent of the Neue Freie Presse, the most prestigious Viennese daily. Appalled by the Dreyfus affair, Herzl — an assimilationist — turned to Zionism.

After the Anschluss in 1938, the newspaper was expropriated by the Nazis from its Jewish owners. Today, the Neue Freie Presse is known as Die Presse. .

Andreas Unterberger, the foreign editor, is well aware of its historic cachet. In a tone suggesting regret, he says there are no longer Jews on its staff. Such are the vicissitudes of time.

RABBI DAVID J. GOLDBERG

Isaac more than Abraham's son

Several years ago I was leading a study group on parshat Vayera. We were discussing the story of the binding of Isaac when someone asked, "Why in the world do we count Isaac as one of our Patriarchs? He was such a shlemiel. How stupid and passive do you have to be not to realize that your father is about to slit your throat and burn you to a crisp?"

Harsh words about someone whose merits keep us in favor with God. But there is a great deal of truth in the criticism that was laid upon Isaac.

In parshat Vayera and in this week's parshah, Toldot, we gain clues to the personality and contributions of Isaac. Isaac is one of the most enigmatic figures of the Torah. It is not so much what we know about him that calls his character into question as that which is unsaid. Isaac is never really in the centre of the action, never the protagonist. In biblical scenes, Isaac tends to be acted upon by others.

Isaac is bound for sacrifice to God without so much as a whimper. The Midrash tells us that Isaac was 37 years old at the time and keeps asking Abraham, his father, about the absence of the ram. The ram was never absent, for Isaac was it and he never realized this. In the biblical text he is silent.

Isaac is the only biblical character who is missing from his own betrothal. Both Abraham and Jacob picked their wives. Isaac's engagement to Rebecca is handled through the hands of a messenger. Isaac is silent; Abraham's slave speaks for him.

In the stories of the redigging of Abraham's wells and of the encounter with Abimelech recounted this week, Isaac does nothing new; rather, he replays the scenes of a generation earlier. He is elsewhere manipulated by Rebecca into giving his blessing to Jacob instead of Esau. His personality is like an echo, not clear or defined in itself. He seems almost like a non-entity, always known as the son of his father or the father of his son.

This is primarily what Isaac was. In this week's portion we read: "And these are the generations of Isaac, Abraham's son: Abraham begat Isaac." Following close on the heels of this verse is the birth of Esau and Jacob. Isaac appears to be only a link between Abraham and Jacob.

Isaac needed to find his own place in a world that was dominated by the genius of his father. How did Isaac do this? He simply carried on. Isaac became Abraham's "successor." Being a successor is probably one of the most unrewarding of callings. A successor is called upon to carry on what was accomplished before without changing things too much, if at all. A successor is constantly being compared to the predecessor and criticized for not being more like that person.

While it has been said that "all beginnings are difficult," continuation can be even more difficult. While it is true that all revolutionaries have to struggle against imposing forces and circumstasnces, the verdict on their success lies with their successors, the generation that works to stabilize the fruits of the revolution. It is often the generation of successors that has to bear the backlash of the old and displaced, and continue to struggle with the new reality.

If we look at Isaac in this way, we see that we can find in him eternal significance and value. Isaac is more than Abraham's son. Isaac establishes Abraham for future generations by accepting his role as successor. He allows the revolution to continue and grow. He holds steady the course. He redigs the wells that his father dug before him and became stopped up.

This is often the role of succeeding generations. The parent digs wells; but the passage of time, enemies and habit fill the wells with earth. It is the children's responsibility to go back and dig the wells again and cause them to flow again.

Isaac is not the symbol of the power that breaks through a wall and creates something new. Rather, he is the symbol of the power that conserves and maintains things in their place. Isaac struggles to sustain the ways that his father created, in order to keep them from being lost.

He shows a quiet strength in his ability to keep things stabilized, while curbing any desire he may have to try new experiments or to create new forms. By being strong in this way Isaac not only preserves what Abraham founded, he paves the way for Jacob to come along and accomplish great things.

Isaac represents the silent generations in Jewish history. Those of my generation have also been called a silent generation. The generation before mine devoted their energies to protesting a war, actively campaigning for environmental causes and petitioning for equal rights.

The generation of the 1980s and '90s may, indeed, be a silent generation. But the silence is not necessarily a silence of passivity or apathy. It may be the silence of strength. From all indications, today's youth are paying attention to their studies. The silent generation is exploiting many of the academic freedoms won by their predecessors and making sure that they survive. Could there be, in reality, profound strength at the heart of the silence?

Like Isaac, this generation and the next need the courage and commitment to maintain the accomplishments of previous generations. To keep alive the insistence on ecological responsibility and to constantly renew the demand for peaceful solutions to conflicts around the world is akin to redigging the wells of our ancestors.

Many see this generation as one in crisis. Studies such as the National Jewish Population Survey point to negative population growth within the North American Jewish community, increasing rates of intermarriage, and the decrease of personal religious observance. Some conclude that Judaism in North America is in jeopardy.

This could be a generation in crisis Jewishly, even as Isaac's generation could have been a generation of crisis. After all, in last week's parshah both Abraham and Sarah were buried. And Isaac emerges as a hero. He nurtures, maintains, and transmits the work of his parents, preparing the way for the energy and innovations of the generation of Jacob.

The Abrahams of Jewish life, those who innovate, recreate, and forge new paths are few and far between. They are scattered across the generations of Jewish history.

As Jews today our task is to dig anew the wells of wisdom dug by our predecessors, and creatively to implement their insights in our changing Jewish world. We can be heroes even as Isaac was a hero of the Torah.

Holocaust photo exhibition full of symbolism

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A latent talent for photography became strikingly apparent when Shai Spetgang, 18, participated in the March of the Living earlier this year.

His 22-item photo exhibit, Constructive Testimony, will be displayed for the first time, in conjunction with Holocaust Education Week from Nov. 7 to 9 at York University's Student Centre art gallery and in the lobby of the Sidney Smith building at the University of Toronto on Nov. 14. Plans are under way to take the display across Canada.

The display is rife with symbolism, from the number of items, which corresponds to the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, to the content of the photos themselves, which are notable — with two exceptions — for the absence of people.

Spetgang felt that the dearth of people in the photos would result in "a universal message," particularly for others who have visited or will visit the same sites at different times.

Using high-speed film and a Black's automatic camera with a zoom lens, Spetgang, who has no photographic training, took pictures of "things I thought would be striking."

He put the exhibit together with advice from Elaine Dobel and Jane McMichael, archivist and photographer respectively at the Salvation Army Heritage Centre, where Spetgang works part-time as an archival assistant.

Spetgang's mother, Pnina Zilberman, is director of the Holocaust Education Centre and served as a "sounding board" when he was planning the exhibit.

The first shot in the exhibit captures the surrealistic reflection of a row of Israeli flags in the window of an Auschwitz barracks. The flags were held aloft by students at the front of the Canadian contingent as they marched from Auschwitz to Birkenau.

A sheet of Mylar covers the picture, so that people will see their own image in the exhibit, Spetgang explains. The final item in the display, a symbolically blank sheet of white paper, is also covered by Mylar. "The idea is to look at yourself at the beginning and the end," says Spetgang.

Building structures

"It is my hope that those who will view this exhibit will be shocked by the superimpositions and captions," Spetgang wrote in a media release. "Only by understanding each other's cultures will we overcome racism and prejudice in our society."

Many of the pictures feature wood, nails and other building materials, a theme which Spetgang found himself thinking about as he began his journey on the March. "One builds structures with building materials...and look at what was built with these...?" is the theme of the exhibit.

A student at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto when he took the pictures, Spetgang is now in his first year of Environmental Studies at York University.

A rare personal note in Spetgang's exhibit is found in a jarring aerial photograph of a busy Warsaw traffic circle criss-crossed by trolley tracks. The high number of bright red vehicles injects an unexpected element into a display almost devoid of color. "Did these tracks take away my grandparents?" asks the caption.

The Villas of 760 please meticulous buyers

Today, when making a major purchase such as a home, people choose with an eye to quality and the long term. The Villas of 760 are designed and built to meet the requirements of even the most meticulous buyer. Solid construction, easy maintenance, and the safety, comfort and decorative tastes of the home owner have all been treated as essentials.

There are three models, the Monte Carlo, the Monaco and the Cannes. All are solidly built of clay brick. Soldier coursing, brick arches and keystones give the Villas elegant, dignified exteriors which harmonize with the permanence and solidity of their construction.

Other exterior features include pre-finished maintenance-free aluminum soffit, fascia, eavestrough and downspouts. Every house also has a balcony in front, and an external connection for a gas barbecue.

The front door is fitted with a brass grip set, house number, coach lamp, door bell with electric chime, and deadbolt lock. In addition, it has a rough-in for a security system. There are casement or fixed thermal windows in front, and a pre-cast concrete slab and paved walkway to the entrance.

Every Villa has its own private garage and paved driveway in front. In all models, there is a tap in the garage. The basements, located at street level next the garage, have poured concrete walls; there is a powder room and storage area in each basement, as well as an inside stairway to the main floor.

The elegance and solidity of the exterior is matched within the house. The interior trim features brass finish hardware. There are Series 800 doors in finished areas, and Colonial baseboards with quarter-round in all tiled areas. All the main floor archways are trimmed. For floor areas, the vendor offers a selection of quality 35-ounce broadloom, and a choice of ceramic tile in kitchen, entrance foyer, main bath and powder room.

In the kitchen, there is luminous overhead lighting. For cabinet styles and counter tops, the buyer may select a variety from vendor's samples. The stove area is equipped with an overhead exhaust fan. The sink is double stainless steel, with a single-lever faucet and rough-in plumbing for an automatic dishwasher.

All models have two bathrooms plus a powder room. The vendor offers a selection of ceramic wall bathroom tile, and a choice of vanity cabinets and counter tops to form a pleasing contrast with the fixtures, which are all white.

The vanities have sinks with single-lever taps; also, beside every vanity, there are electrical outlets for small appliances such as razors. Over the mirrors in powder room, main bath and ensuite bath, there is vanity strip lighting.

In the unfinished area of each basement, there is a circuit breaker type electrical panel with 100 amp service, and two outlets under the panel. All wiring is installed in accordance with Ontario Hydro standards, with heavy-duty wiring and receptacles for stoves, refrigerators and dryers. The bedroom light fixtures are in the ceilings. All switches and receptacles are white.

Both safety and energy conservation have influenced the design of the Villas. Safety features include a smoke detector in the upper hallway. Heating and air conditioning are individually controlled; gas and hydro are individually metred.

Each Villa has a mid-efficiency forced air, gas-fired and gas-heated integrated hot water system, and a hot-water tank with a rental contract from Consumer's Gas.The water pipes are copper. There is R19 insulation in the exterior walls, R32 in the roof and R12 in the basement. For convenience, the thermostat is located centrally on the main floor.

The interior walls and trim will be painted with two coats of off-white premium quality latex paint. Except for the kitchen, laundry room, washrooms and basement, all ceilings are stippled in white.

The Villas of 760 are conveniently located on Lawrence Avenue West, just east of Dufferin, a five minute walk from the Lawrence West subway and a short drive to Yorkdale shopping mall. There are schools and synagogues within easy walking distance.

The people who bring you the Villas of 760 have a distinguished history of developing and building quality residences across southern Ontario and the states of Florida and Georgia for over 50 years. In Toronto, major projects include the Sailwinds Condominiums and College Park and the Pavilion.

Construction begins in spring 1995; possession is scheduled for late summer or autumn that year. The prices range from $179,900 to $224,000. Capped-rate mortgage financing is available through the CIBC.

North York candidates find few burning issues

Municipal Decision '94

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Mel Lastman

Milton Berger

Mike Feldman

Michael Klein

David Shiner

NORTH YORK — In many respects, the Nov. 14 civic election campaign in North York mirrors that in Toronto and other municipalities.

In others words, it's a bit of a yawner.

The ubiquitous Mel Lastman is poised to win a record 10th term in the mayor's chair. There have been several acclamations and there seem to be few burning issues in North York, home to the largest Jewish population of any Metro municipality — about 70,000.

Metro Toronto vote

Lastman, 61, clearly enjoys the city's top job and intends on staying for as long as the electorate will have him. He isn't too worried by challenges from Julia McCrea and black community leader Lennox Farrell.

"People aren't telling me much," the Jewish mayor told The CJN. "There just aren't too many problems in North York."

Lastman says he can back that claim up. North York, he points out, has seen no tax increases over the past two years, and hizzoner plans to keep it that way through 1997.

In typical grand fashion, the irrepressible Lastman says his city can boast "the best services in the world" — twice-weekly garbage collection, no blocking of driveways after snow plowing and the preservation of neighborhoods' residential character, while at the same time, "downtown" North York has seen a mini-explosion in gleaming high-rise office buildings.

It's all been done, he notes, by cutting $35 million from the city's budget over the past three years and reducing municipal staff through attrition.

Now that his long fight to bring the Sheppard Avenue subway line into his city is over, Lastman has set his sights on several other projects.

One is a senior peer counselling service to be headquartered in the Centrepoint Mall. Funded mostly by the federal government, it will help seniors cope with problems like loneliness, illness or the loss of a loved one by talking to someone their age who has experienced the same thing.

Another is using a blue garbage bag to partially replace blue boxes. Bags would be used to hold bottles and cans, while paper would go in the box. That would eliminate the need for sorting, and Lastman wants one truck to collect everything. The program is being tested in parts of the city and is working "remarkably well," he says — not to mention that it would save millions of dollars if implemented city-wide.

Lastman says he's running mainly on his record — just as Milton Berger is in his quest for re-election as councillor in Ward 6.

First elected in 1977, Berger too has tied his fortunes to North York's two-year-old tax freeze, which he'd like to see extended for as long as possible.

Berger told The CJN the city "headed off" tax increases five years ago, when it began trimming the budget just as a recession loomed.

Berger's ward is bounded roughly by Lawrence Avenue, Bathurst Street, the Don River and Hillhurst Boulevard, north of Eglinton Avenue. The majority of the 38,000 residents are homeowners.

The veteran incumbent says traffic is a major concern, especially since much of it results from the population boom in York Region. The city is testing two traffic circles in Ward 6.

Berger says he's played a large role in helping the city preserve his ward's residential flavor by bringing in a bylaw limiting the size of homes and their lots.

Also seeking re-election is Mike Feldman, picked in a 1992 byelection to complete the term of the late Irving Chapley in Ward 7.

Feldman, 66, says voters' concerns revolve around crime and safety, taxes and, in his ward, the future of the Downsview Airport and Canadian Forces Base Downsview lands.

He says he would like to see tax-paying industries on the lands to make up for the millions in lost federal revenue.

Ward 7 is bounded by Wilson Avenue, Bathurst, Steeles and Keele Street. Feldman says he's been successful in persuading many homeowners to appeal their tax assessments, resulting in significant savings.

Feldman, who held Ward 8 on council for six months in 1985, tallies a long list of civic and Jewish community activities. He's national president of the Canadian Friends of Haifa University and is involved in the Reena Foundation.

He says he was instrumental in securing some $230,000 for the refurbishing of the tennis courts at the North JCC, now the Bathurst Jewish Centre. The money, however, has not been spent pending the outcome of the centre's financial woes.

Running against Feldman for ward councillor is Michael Klein, a 42-year-old multi-media artist and publisher who placed third in the ward when he ran three years ago.

Klein says city council has been far too pro-development. "They look at development like candy," he told The CJN. "To them, it is just a source of more revenue."

Klein says he would take a far more cautious approach to development. Much of his campaign revolves around environmental issues.

Too much traffic, he says, has created excessive noxious fumes. Klein would get the province to enforce its guidelines on emissions and he would institute municipal fines for cars, trucks and industries which exceed limits.

Seniors lash out at government cuts to social services

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new mood of militancy was evident among Toronto area seniors when 500 jammed the St. Lawrence Centre recently and another 200 were turned away.

The meeting, under the motto Seniors Under Attack and supported by 10 Metro senior groups, was spearheaded by the Association of Jewish Seniors, with Goldie Leibman as coordinator.

"I am convinced this is the beginning of a revolution," said chair Al Gorlick, to thunderous applause, as he read a resolution calling on the federal government to collect additional taxes from the wealthy and to "cancel the slashing and burning of our social safety net."

When the meeting ended, many seniors gathered in Bercy park across the road bearing placards reading, "Do it Right, or We Fight," and "SOS, Save Our Seniors." When the signs ran out, others put on "Enough is Enough" badges.

The meeting was interrupted from time to time so that translations in Portuguese, Hindi, Spanish and Cantonese could be related to various groups. Two bus loads from Villa Colombo arrived too late to be admitted but the passengers will get their own briefing.

One group held aloft a big banner, "The Filipino Community of Brampton." A large number of turbaned Sikhs were in the audience.

The main speakers zeroed in on the facts that four out of 10 seniors in Canada are so poor they receive supplemental income, that the "clawbacks" of old age security and the phased elimination of the old age credit are betrayals of Canadian citizens, and that corporations have found loopholes in the Canadian tax laws but the government is targetting seniors.

The de-listing of free drugs for seniors includes antihistamines, antacids, lubricating eye drops and Caneston, used by women to combat vaginal infections, said Rita Duenisch-Turner, a member of the steering committee.

She said "snowbirds" are being penalized by having their out-of-province hospital bills allowance cut from $400 to $100 a day, even though the action's legality is in question.

In the discussion period, a woman said she is a volunteer at a Metro home for the aged and staff cutbacks have resulted in a shortage of staff to feed residents who need help. "The seniors take a long time to be fed and the trays are being taken away from them. People are starving. The union won't let us feed them."

There were calls for a march on Ottawa from the audience, and references to the betrayal of seniors by politicians were loudly applauded.

All the cuts to benefits to seniors are a result of "ageism" Duenisch-Turner said. "It's the only 'ism' allowed in this city."

A shortage of staff for bedside nursing, and a reduction of 41,100 in the number of hospital beds since 1989 has resulted in patients being sent back and forth from hospital to home up to four times, she said. "In the older women's network we know that seniors will die because they were sent home too early."

The attitude of some officials is exemplified by the decision to build a seniors housing project next to the Keele Street dump in York Region, she said. "We're part of a landfill project.

"Every segment of society in Canada is under attack except the wealthy and big business," said Bruce Mutch, past president, Canadian Pensioners Concerned.

The government's intention to cut the deficit by eroding the social net is nothing more than a symbolic gesture to the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, he declared. "I hope I'm wrong but I think Axworthy, Martin and Chretien have accepted the situation handed to them by the former Tory regime and they seem bent on the same agenda."

Only three per cent of the 3,300,000 seniors in Canada earn over $53,000, Mutch said, adding: "More power to them; if they pay their taxes they deserve their pensions like us."

A total of 57 per cent of Canadian seniors have incomes between $10,000 and $53,000, and the majority are at the lower end of the scale. "And most are women" a man in the audience shouted.

Slicing away of the old age credit means that seniors with more than $26,000 in income will lose $950, if single, and $1,900 if married. "Is it any wonder that seniors are apprehensive?" he asked.

The 1994 income tax schedule has been reduced to three levels; therefore, a person earning $30,000 pays the same rate as one earning $55,000, one with an income of $60,000 pays at the same rate as those with incomes of $200,000, $500,000 or even $1,000,000. "There is one reason for the deficit."

Winton running in Markham

MARKHAM — Marsha Winton, a Jewish advertising executive, is running for councillor in Markham's Ward 7 in the Nov. 14 municipal elections.

Her involvement in Scouts Canada has, she says, particularly sensitized her to environmental issues.

She would like to see the Model Community Demonstration Project, which has resulted in 70 per cent of household waste in participating homes being recycled, expanded to the rest of the town.

Winton also wants to ensure that tax dollars are spent as wisely as possible.

While she believes municipal managers have done their best, "I am sure that with small economies and streamlined procedures, savings can add up and we can be more efficient."

Other Jewish candidates for Ward 7 councillor are Harvey Goodman and Paul Wizman [CJN, Oct. 27].

In her campaigning, Winton has found great concern over snow removal, especially snowplows filling in newly-shovelled driveways. She would like to explore the possiblity of articulated plows.

Winton says she would initiate a series of newsletters to her constituents to let them know of council's activities and plans.

Marsha Winton

"There is a perceived barrier at Highway 404," Winton says. "Information seems to go [north] to the towns of Markham and Unionville, but not to Thornhill. I want to correct that."

Palestinian comment upsets Rabbi Englander

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

MISSISSAUGA — A news release issued by Palestine House immediately after the Oct. 19 bus bombing in Tel Aviv prompted an angry response to Rashad Saleh, president of Palestine House, by Rabbi Lawrence Englander, spiritual leader of Solel Congregation, Mississauga's only synagogue.

The news release strongly condemned the bombing but continued, "Israel has been warned before to heed such acts by expediting the implementation of the peace process... Ignoring or bypassing the national and political rights of the Palestinians will encourage violence." [CJN, Oct. 27]

Rabbi Englander said he was encouraged by the condemnation, but became "discouraged, and even angry" at the remainder of the news release.

"For you to say that 'Israel has been warned before...' is to stoop to the inexcusable level of blaming the victim," he wrote.

The letter followed an Oct. 7 address by Elias Hazineh, vice-president of Palestine House, to Solel members following Friday night services. [CJN, Oct. 27] "I had hoped that our invitation to you on Oct. 7 would begin to open the channel of dialogue between our two communities," Rabbi Englander wrote.

"If you use a tragic event as an opportunity to score debating points against those working for peace, then it appears to me that a true dialogue has not yet begun."

In a telephone interview, Saleh told The CJN he felt he had been "insulted" by Rabbi Englander's letter. He said the rabbi "should be more open-minded and should take criticism the same way people expect me to take it." He added that "maybe Rabbi Englander lacked some information."

Saleh sent the rabbi a brief reply acknowledging receipt of his letter and enclosing two editorials, including one from the Toronto Star which criticized Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin for preventing Gazan Palestinian day-laborers from working in Israel following the bombing. "Such collective punishment likely will drive more Palestinians into the arms of Hamas," warned the editorial.

Saleh maintains he wasn't trying to blame Israelis, but that he was "pointing out" potential further problems.

"I think his timing is definitely off," Rabbi Englander said.

Both Saleh and the rabbi said that it is not up to the Arab or Jewish communities here to solve the problems of the Middle East.

"If we can prove that we can live here in peace and harmony, we can set an example for them," Saleh said.

War veterans leader steps down

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prarie Corresondent

WINNIPEG — Sid Winston, the founding commander of the Winnipeg branch of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, has stepped down after 17 years at the helm.

Winston passed the baton of command to Max L. Katz, following an Oct. 20 election meeting at which the branch renamed itself the Jewish War Veterans of Canada General Moshe Dayan Post of Winnipeg.

Winston, who says he is over 80, was asked by Major Ben Dunkelman to form the Winnipeg post. "We had guys who served in Israel who weren't eligible to join the Royal Canadian Legion," he said. "We took them into our branch. We also have a lot of members who belong to the (mainly Jewish) General Monash Branch of the Legion. They like our way of running things."

He said the post's membership has grown from 40 to over 80 in the last three months.

Winston decided to step down after learning he was the sole post member to believe that religious headgear, including kipot, should not be worn in military clubrooms. He also said he is feeling worn out.

Metro election draws diverse group of candidates

Municipal Decision '94

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

Stuart Weinstein

Howard Moscoe

Dr. Paul Moscoe

Norm Gardner

TORONTO — A 51-year-old dentist, Dr. Paul Moscoe, running for public office for the first time, is campaigning to eliminate the very job he's trying to get.

Moscoe, who has lived and practised in the Midtown Metro ward for 20 years, is opposing incumbent Ila Bossons and Yen Shih. His main campaign plank is to eliminate the Metro level of government because it is "redundant, ineffective and for the most part obsolete."

A referendum on this question is being submitted to City of Toronto voters and Moscoe predicts that the vote will favor eliminating Metro.

A dentist who has business experience in the retail, manufacturing and real estate investment fields, Moscoe is already lobbying legislature members to approve doing away with Metro since it comes under provincial jurisdiction.

A former member of Holy Blossom Temple, Moscoe said he joined the Narayever Synagogue in downtown Toronto because he likes its more intimate atmosphere.

Municipal councils need people with business experience, he said, and this brought him into the election race.

A graduate of the University of Toronto dental school, he has worked in dental clinics in various Toronto hospitals, he coaches athletic teams in his ward, and he is a fundraiser for Variety Village. He and his wife, Catherine, have four children, Kenneth, 26, Dana, 24, Charles, 16 and Maya, 14, who all attended Leo Baeck Day School, where Moscoe was a former board member.

In the Metro ward of York Humber in the city of York, 28-year-old Stuart Weinstein is trying to unseat Metro Chairman Alan Tonks who was acclaimed in the last two elections.

"Tonks is beatable and I'm going to win," Weinstein told The CJN.

Running for office for the first time, Weinstein said his experience as a welfare recipient for a year after graduation from university convinced him that "municpal politics needs cleaning up."

"I was treated like garbage," he said.

Holder of a master of business arts degree from the University of Windsor, the Toronto-born Weinstein said he developed his own job after a year on welfare and is now on leave of absence from a construction firm where he specialized in fire resistant techniques.

His platform includes amalgamating all six school boards and all six fire departments into one Metro wide board for each and tougher laws against prostitution and drug offences. He wants owners of vechicles used for sex infractions to be fined $1,000. He is also in favor of removing all the glass at welfare offices to allow clients and workers to communicate properly. One-quarter of the students in his ward cannot even afford to take the subway, he says, and so he favors a student TTC metropass.

Weinstein, who is single, is a member of Beth Tzedec Congregation and participates in the Baycrest Run every year. He was active in an employment data project for young Jewish adults at Beth Tzedec.

Norm Gardner has won his third term on Metro Council for North York Centre by acclamation. "I can use a break, elections are strenuous," said Gardner. Despite his acclamation, he still attends any election meetings in North York Ward Nine to which he is invited.

Howard Moscoe, sitting Metro councillor for North York Spadina, has also won by acclamation, for only the second time in his 16 years in municipal life.

CJA launches Golden Givers

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Combined Jewish Appeal is going to be instituting a Golden Giver program to recognize longtime supporters of the annual campaign, 25-year contributors.

"This is an opportunity to recognize people who have given of their time, energy and money to the campaign over the years," said CJA director Jerry Koffman. "The level of the gift is not important. All contributions have equal value. We just want to tell our givers that we appreciate their support."

Seeking help

The organization is asking the help of Winnipeg's Jewish community in compiling a list of names of honorees. All the Golden Givers' names will be published in the Jewish Post and News and they will all be honored at a special volunteer evening in the spring.

The project is being co-chaired by Serky Goldberg and Ed Vickar, who both qualify as Golden Givers themselves.

Medical students benefit from ethnic agency placements

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Marcia Zemans began teaching weekly health classes to Russian Jewish immigrants last year, she quickly learned to steer away from anti-smoking lectures.

"They weren't interested," laughs the third-year medical student at the University of Toronto. "They said, 'We've lived through so much, let us enjoy these little pleasures.' "

Instead, Zemans found the English-language students at Toronto's Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS) eager to talk about education and professional opportunities in Canada. The free and frank discussions, in which Zemans said she learned as much as she imparted, were a new and welcome part of her medical training.

"If you consider the last 100 years, 80 per cent of the Toronto population comes from immigrant families," she said. "To understand their experience . . . will hopefully make me a better doctor."

Zemans' JIAS placement illustrates a new approach designed by medical educators to strenghten the relationship between doctors and the communities they serve through greater communication and contact.

"We want the student to go beyond the biomedical approach [to learn] how the community is organized to deal with these illnesses," said Dr. Donald Wasylenki, coordinator of the Health, Illness and the Community course introduced at the U of T two years ago.

The students work with public health nurses and home care providers before volunteering with one of 252 community agencies. They can choose from Jewish, Italian, Chinese and East Indian community agencies, or from larger community agencies that work with compulsive gamblers, substance abusers and battered women.

Judy Hagshi, 23, spent one afternoon a week last year learning about child abuse at the Jewish Family & Child Services (JF&CS). She is planning to practise family medicine, and said the JF&CS placement taught her how to detect potential abuse and how to meet patients' expectations.

"It's not just looking into the ear and giving the antibiotic," she said. "They wanted their family doctor to ask about their lives, their kids and work."

Community workers say students learning to create a richer doctor-patient relationship is one benefit of the course.

"[The students get] some awareness of who the people are that they are working with, rather than just the diseases of the people they are working with," said Fay Geitzhals, Hagshi's supervisor at JF&CS.

Another benefit of the new approach, said Wasylenki, is that doctors broaden the possibilities for their treatment of patients by using community support services like the palliative care, family counselling and seniors' programs available within the Toronto Jewish community.

"They know we pick up patients after they leave the hospital, how we fit in," said Andrew Somogyi, a researcher who has worked with two medical students at Jewish Vocational Service's rehabilitative head injury program.

How immigrants have difficulties fitting into the medical system was a lesson JIAS staffer Roslynne Greenberg said Zemans and another medical student learned.

"They were surprised at the difficulty [the immigrants] had expressing they had a pain," Greenberg said, adding that JIAS welcomes future placements.

As for Zemans, who hopes to become a psychiatrist, working with the Soviets was more than wanting to help immigrant Jews, she said. It was also practical.

"Any psychiatric work you do is transcultural," she said. "You can't deny someone's background."

Jewish candidates win seats in Halifax election

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Just seven more men for a minyan and Jewish services can be held at Halifax City Hall.

With the recent election of the first two Jewish aldermen in the city's history plus a Jewish city manager, yarmulkes may be the order of the day at council meetings.

Lifelong Halifax residents Jerry Blumenthal and Howard Epstein won election and will serve the city for the next three years. Barry Coopersmith joined city staff as city manager last January.

Blumenthal defeated a longtime incumbent to take his north end seat, becoming the first non-Roman Catholic ever to hold the ward of about 6,400 voters. It was his second try at winning the seat, having been defeated in a close race six years ago.

"I visited every home in the ward twice and made sure I was visible during the election campaign," said the 54-year-old retired school principal. "I am not a politician. They make promises and then never keep them. I campaigned on honesty. I know so many parents [of former schoolchildren] and they know I never lied to them or their children."

Blumenthal taught in the Halifax school system for 34 years after receiving his bachelor and masters of education at Dalhousie University, and furthering his education with diplomas in education administration and physical education. He also completed a French immersion teaching program at University of Montreal.

Blumenthal taught in Halifax

A member of Beth Israel Synagogue, he was also sports director and tripping instructor at Camp Kadimah, and served several terms on the Halifax Recreation Commission.

He outpolled incumbent Marie O'Malley 1,845-1,425, as almost 50 per cent of voters turned out. "I just want to work as hard as I can for the kids and their parents and the seniors in the community," he said. "I'll be accessible."

Howard Epstein

Jerry Blumenthal

Epstein, a 1973 graduate of Dalhousie Law School, was executive director of the Ecology Action Centre of Nova Scotia for the past three years. He is presently practising law and teaching at Dalhousie Law School but plans to devote considerable time to his aldermanic post.

"I ran for the seat because I found council was making decisions I didn't like," said Epstein, who had battled council on behalf of many parties during his law days. "I want council to make good decisions the first time, rather than spend money and cause aggravation by having decisions overturned."

Epstein defeated two other candidates by 67 and 150 votes. He made the decision to run after the incumbent, who had held the seat for 33 years, decided to retire. "I had thought of running before but there was no point battling Nick Meagher [the former alderman]."

Epstein, who spent six years as a camper at Camp Kadimah (from 1956-61), ran an environmentally-conscious campaign, printing signs on cardboard ("reusable, recyclable and compostable," he said) rather than plastic compounds used by other candidates. "I knocked on every door and literally wore a hole in my shoes."

Both candidates will be sworn to office Nov. 7. The next municipal election will be in Oct. 1997.

Halifax has had one Jewish mayor in its 245-year history — Leonard Kitz, a lawyer who served from 1955-57. Dartmouth (across the Harbour from Halifax) also has had one Jewish chief magistrate — developer Joseph Zatzman who served from 1963 to 1967.

Metro Police gets new liaison to the Jewish community

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Metro Toronto Police has a new "Jewish squad" in Police Constable Phillip Glavin, now the force's liaison to the Jewish community.

Glavin is the first non-Jew in a decade — perhaps ever — to head the Jewish section of the force's Inter-Community Relations Unit, also known as the community relations or the ethnic squad.

He replaces PC Al Bowman, who's been reassigned to Metro's 14 Division.

Glavin, 33, is a 14-year police veteran who has worked mainly in criminal and drug investigations in the tough, western downtown area. It will now be his job to work with Jewish organizations and generally act as middleman between the police and the community on an ongoing basis, as well as whenever anti-Semitic activity flares up.

Glavin won't be responding directly to requests for investigations. He'll follow up in the event of a cemetery desecration, swastika-daubing or an individual incident of anti-Semitism.

"I'm amazed at how happily the community has accepted me," Glavin told The CJN.

Set up in the early 1970s, the Inter-Community Relations Unit tries to smooth often bumpy relations between the police and Metro's ethnic communities.

PC Phillip Glavin

Squad members act as liaison between the force and members of the Filipino, Chinese, Vietnamese, black, south Asian, Italian, Portuguese, French and Jewish communities.

About a year ago, as part of cost-cutting measures, unit members lost their plainclothes status. Wearing a uniform is now optional, but Glavin and others on the squad are sticking to civilian clothes.

"A lot of Holocaust survivors may not like talking to someone wearing a uniform and gun," Glavin said, adding that others in the Jewish community — particularly Russian and other immigrants — may also fear and mistrust a uniformed police officer.

Glavin has already touched base with B'nai Brith and Canadian Jewish Congress, and is boning up on hate crimes, the Heritage Front, pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel and other issues of concern to Metro Jews.

He'll also work with Project P, the Ontario Provincial Police unit on pornography and hate materials, and with the RCMP in monitoring overall security.

It's also Glavin who will oversee the special security measures around synagogues and communal facilities during the High Holy Day period and whenever attacks against Jews take place abroad.

Call him at (416) 324-6302.

Correction

The Oct. 20 CJN incorrectly characterized the platform of Mike Seiden, candidate for public school trustee in the City of Toronto's Ward 15.

In addition to public funding for independent schools, Seiden supports the abolition of the Metro School Board, monthly meetings with student council executives, small class sizes for Grades 1 and 2 (15-20 children) and employing phonics starting in Grade 1, among others issues.

Atideynu lodge starts in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Atideynu, the city's newest B'nai Brith lodge, is for those between 28 and 45.

"A few of us were tired of the apathy of singles groups," said Gail Frankel, marketing manager of the Jewish Post and News and a co-founder of Atidenyu (Hebrew for our future). "We have married friends and felt there should be a group for younger singles and couples."

Frankel, Jodi Binnun, Sherri Caine, Cheryl Karlinsky and Joel Pinsky met in August with Sophie Tapper, B'nai Brith's executive director in Winnipeg, and Rabbi Alan Green of the Beth Israel Synagogue. The first organizing meeting on Sept. 18 attracted 30 and a later bingo-bowling evening drew 70 people.

Frankel hopes to attract 50 members.

The group will hold one program a month, with the first three open to everyone. Dues are expected in January, when an executive will be formed.

"We hope people will consider joining," Tapper said. "This is a good opportunity to meet other people and enjoy good programs."

A dinner and dance is planned for November. Any proceeds from Atideynu activities will go towards funding the work of the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights.

Lifestyle issues focus of Winnipeg forum

WINNIPEG — Caring, Learning, Growing and Sharing is a program to be presented to the Winnipeg Jewish community from Nov. 6-9.

A program highlight will be Lynn Leight, a leading Jewish American educator on human sexuality, speaking at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue. Workshops and panel discussions will be held at the YMHA Jewish Community Centre on interdating and intermarriage, sexuality and alternative lifestyles, suicide, parent-child relationships in the adolescent years and drug and alcohol uses.

Sponsor of the program is the caring community education committee, a sub-committee of the Crisis Response Co-ordinating Committee which was formed early in the year in response to young suicides in the community.

The subcommittee was formed after the Crisis Response Committee invited American educator Les Franklin in February to talk about the issue of youth suicide.

HONOR FOR HISTORIAN

Martin Gilbert (right), historian, author and official biographer of Sir Winston Churchill, attended a reception in his honor in Toronto recently, hosted by local members of the 45 Aid Society. Gilbert is honorary president of the Society which consists of the few surviving children from the Nazi Polish death camps who were taken to England to start a new life. Izzie Light(left), seated next to his wife Marylyn, was one of the 200 orphans admitted to England in 1945. Gilbert, who was visiting Canada for the filming of the TV production, A Rough Crossing, was one of the British children evacuated to Canada during World War II; he was returned to his parents 3½ years later.

Life after breast cancer exists, say survivors

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Being treated for breast cancer is not the end of the world," says Marilyn Abram, who chaired a recent forum about the effect of breast cancer on the family. Abram, a financial coordinator at York University, was diagnosed with breast cancer in 1990 and underwent radiation treatments.

She was joined by co-panelists Heather Chetwynd, a nurse; Anne Ferguson, president, Volunteers Princess Margaret; and Marsha Razin, a teacher — all of whom are breast cancer survivors.

Oncologist Richard Hasselback spoke about the medical aspect and stressed the importance of breast self-examination for women of all ages.

The forum was a program of B'nai Brith's Leonard Mayzel Lodge, held at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation.

Razin, who was diagnosed in 1990 and underwent a month of radiation, said that she and her husband have developed a "deeper closeness" since that time.

When she initially joined a support group, though, she went alone. "Why bother anyone?" she remembers thinking.

"That was a mistake," she realizes now. "Closeness is built by sharing even the painful [experiences]."

Ferguson told of the role her husband played in her recovery even before her cancer was diagnosed. Although she had already seen a surgeon because of breast lumps, her husband insisted she return when she discovered a lump under her arm.

"But I was just there two months ago," she told him. "I don't know if doctors really understand the kind of courage it takes [to call them]," she said.

After a "disfiguring" mastectomy, Ferguson says it was "wonderful" to have her husband tell her he loved her, even though she already knew.

"We don't plan as far in advance as we used to," she said. "We've decided that every six months we'll do something we really wanted to do, so we always have something to look forward to."

Ferguson said she made a mistake by calling her daughter in Europe to tell her about the cancer. "I can hear those screams across the airwaves to this day. We didn't have to tell her that day. It could have waited until she was safe with family.

"We told everybody," she said. "I'm not sure that would be the way others would have done it, but for me it felt right. The support I got was overwhelming."

Abram didn't want anyone to know that she had breast cancer at first, she recalls. Now she says that decision was a mistake. She didn't want to deal with prying questions and was anxious to shield her mother, who is in her 70s, from the news.

Chetwynd, a single parent who lost a year of work to the disease, credits her grown children with helping her through a period of hair loss, weight gain and depression. "Without their sensitivity and humor, I don't know how the days would have been. My daughter would come in every night and say, 'Come on, Mom, it's exercise time.' I couldn't have done it without her."

Panelists suggested that friends who want to be supportive might call to say, "How are you feeling?" and ask what they can do to help. One panelist suggested that friends offer a specific type of help, such as gardening, shopping or cooking. "I found that when people called and asked what they could do, I honestly didn't know," she said.

Blue Jays GM a real hit at BB affair

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "I'm delighted I can talk baseball with people who not only love the game but who play the game," said Gord Ash.

The new general manager of the Toronto Blue Jays, recently spoke to some 450 people at the 1994 B'nai Brith Baseball Dinner Awards, held at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Before fielding questions from the floor, Ash spoke about the current major league baseball strike, saying that many players are budget conscious, despite their salaries in the millions of dollars.

To illustrate this, he explained that once, before a major road trip, baseball player Dave Winfield drove his Mercedes to a bank near the airport, and negotiated a $10,000 loan, leaving the car as collateral.

According to Ash, Winfield paid back the loan and the interest charge of $38 immediately on his return, and the bank manager asked why he had needed the money in the first place. "It's a simple matter of economics," Winfield purportedly replied. "Where else can I park my car at the airport for only $38?"

Ash, who has been instrumental in the negotiation of major league contracts, was asked what strengths he brought to the job. "There's only a handful of people who can say they've worked 11 years with Pat Gillick, and hopefully some of that has rubbed off on me," he said.

Asked for some complimentary tickets, he replied, "When you've been on strike as long as we have, you can't afford to give away free tickets.

"The success we've enjoyed in the early nineties has pushed our payroll to great heights," he said. "If we had kept our '92 club intact, our payroll would have been $63 million." The Jays' 1993 payroll, he said, was "in the low forties.

"You don't necessarily relate success with contract value. They don't necessarily go hand in hand. We feel we have some good young players who are going to be strong contributors."

Asked about the possibility of major league baseball using "scab" players next year, Ash acknowledged with thanks the offers he had received from many people in the room to play for the Blue Jays.

"It's certainly possible to do," he said. "But given the quality of play, I'm not sure it's something people would want to watch."

Among the guests seated with Ash at the head table were Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, and Lionel Fishman, outgoing commissioner of the B'nai Brith baseball league, who held that position for some 17 years.

"It's time to hand it over," said Fishman. "I've enjoyed the 17 years but you've got to move on."

In B'nai Brith's fast pitch division, awards went to these winning teams and MVPs (most valued players): Tidy Car and Shep Gangbar, pitcher; Maccabiah Bulls and Avi Ritter, pitcher; LMOL Gamblers and David Vyner, third baseman; Forestdale Giants and David Goldstein, catcher and first baseman; Judea Blue Sox and Joel Spillman, pitcher; RWYC Fighting Foxes and Brian Cohen, utility infielder and outfielder; Don Mills Black Sox and Randy Morrison, pitcher.

The Slow Pitch division: Toronto Freedom Fabricland and Meyer Balter, shortstop; Metro T.O. Giants and Daniel Goodman, pitcher; Toronto Freedom Devils and Mark Harendorf, pitcher; Maccabiah Brawler and Gord Cohen, pitcher; Macabiah Pitches and Barry Sheffer, first baseman; Maccabiah Machers and Dan Shereck, first baseman.

Toronto student joins diverse group as Bronfman fellow

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

A pensive Matti Friedman posed in Jerusalem while in Israel as a Bronfman Youth Fellow.

TORONTO — A perceived "fragmentation" of the Jewish community helped prompt the creation eight years ago of the Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel, a fully funded five-week summer program for North American teens.

The brainchild of Edgar Bronfman, chair of the Seagram Company Ltd. and president of the World Jewish Congress, the program is financially supported by the Samuel Bronfman Foundation, Inc.

"By acknowledging what divides us and by concentrating on our common agenda, we can become a stronger and more unified people," Bronfman said in a news release.

This year's group of 26 teens (as in previous years) ran the gamut from Modern Orthodox to unaffiliated Jews, said Matthew (Matti) Friedman, 17, an OAC student at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute and the only Torontonian in this year's program.

Two Montrealers, Judith Batalion and Itia Shmidman, were the only other Canadians.

"Discussions went beyond how observant we were. People had very different ideas of what Israel is and what a Jew is," Friedman said.

Friedman was chosen from nearly 500 applicants following an interview in Boston last March. Students were chosen on the basis of "exceptional talents, accomplishments and intelligent character," according to information from the Bronfman Youth Fellowships' Albany office.

"The intellectual stimulation started way before the program. The interview got me thinking a lot," Friedman said. He recalls being asked about his religious views as well as his knowledge of Israeli politics.

The relationship between Israel and the Diaspora, the fate of the Jewish people outside of Israel, and the Jewishness of Israel itself were (and are) issues that particularly interest Friedman.

He was a founding member of his school's Hebrew Awareness Club, which meets regularly to discuss Jewish issues. During a year his family spent in Baltimore, he founded a student-run poetry magazine at his high school.

An alumnus of Bialik Hebrew Day School and United Synagogue Day School, Friedman has been active at NCSY and has served as Torah reader at several synagogues. He has also worked at Camp Eitan.

In Israel, Friedman's intellectual stimulation continued as the group met with artists, academics and Israeli leaders ranging from right-wing to left. Writers A.B. Yehoshua and Yehuda Amichai were among those who spoke to the group. Bronfman faculty includes rabbis of different denominations and counsellors.

"We had a very interesting weekend," Friedman said. Follow-up activities for Bronfman fellows extend through college.

"I feel an obligation to try and fill [a Jewish leadership] role — not necessarily as head of an organization or prime minister of Israel — but by working for the unity of the community," he said.

Winnipeg senior makes waves

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

The lifelong Winnipegger, now 67, did not start swimming until she was 44. Since then, she has also taken up tennis, skating, cross-country skiing and water skiing.

Rubin says she decided to take swimming lessons originally because she was tired of sitting home with her husband, Dr. Jack Rubin, and their children (son, Ron, lives in Toronto and does television and radio voice-overs), watching sports on television all the time.

It took several years of lessons and practice to reach the instructor level but Rubin persevered.

In 1981, she was sitting around a pool when a friend approached her to join the fledgling Masters program (for athletes over 40).

"I asked what I had to do," Rubin recalls. "I was told I had to swim one length. He forgot to mention I also had to swim 120 laps."

Clarice Rubin

Rubin has been swimming competitively for over 10 years. Provincially, she has won a gold medal in backstroke competition, as well as gold and silver medals in freestyle events.

For the last two years, she has competed in competitions in Palm Springs where she and her husband spend the winter.

In July, she participated in the World Masters Swimming Championships in Montreal in a field of 3,473 athletes from 41 countries including Israel. Competing against several former Olympic swimmers, Rubin finished eighth in her category. The top 10 winners all received medals, she notes. She also won two more medals as part of relay teams where she was swimming with former Olympians.

She describes swimming as one of the toughest sports. "You have to work very hard at it," she says, "and you can lose your conditioning very quickly."

She says she can swim a mile in 33 minutes and can do about two miles at a time.

"There aren't many other Jewish girls in my age group," she says.

Rubin plans to swim again in Palm Springs competitions in February, at the provincial meet in April and the national event in Victoria in May. She is also considering going to the world championships in Sheffield, England, in 1996.

Rabbis explore G-d's role and place in the world

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — G-d has been a constant presence for the Jewish people individually and collectively, even in the Holocaust, agree rabbis from the three main wings of Judaism.

Rabbi W. Guther Plaut of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple, Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa's Orthodox Congregation Machzikei Hadas, and Rabbi Steven Saltzman of Adath Israel Synagogue were taking part in a panel discussion on Ultimate Issues, held recently at Adath Israel.

Moderator Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec led the panel in a discussion of their personal beliefs about the nature of G-d, His place in the world, religious doubt, the Holocaust and the afterlife.

Although the Holocaust was intended to be only a part of the discussion, in fact it proved to be a common thread.

Rabbi Plaut, who fled Germany during the 1930s, said that he went to the seminary after escaping Hitler's persecutions, as a way to become a defender of Jews.

"If this is what they are going to do to us, I will become a defender of Jews. The man who killed six million Jews brought me face to face with something I knew I needed to do."

When he began to study Torah, he said, "I began to understand how the rabbis saw study as a form of worship... You see before you a captive of Torah."

He said he decided he had to take what the philosopher Kierkegaard called "the leap of faith — that in the face of the Holocaust, I say yet I will believe."

His greatest religious doubts came, he said, when he was among the first allied soldiers to enter a concentration camp.

He said he came to believe that G-d surrendered an important aspect of divine power when he made human beings free to love or hate, sacrifice for others, or to kill.

"I have to believe with the words of Tanach [the Bible] that G-d wept with us, even if he was no longer able to dictate to us how to act."

The Holocaust, he said, was a result of the total abandonment of any sense of the Divine. "The Holocaust is the ultimate human perversion."

Rabbi Saltzman said, "If I believed that G-d was not with the children [in the concentration camps] as they died, I couldn't go on. If G-d was not with us in the concentration camps, who needs Him?"

Quoting the 23rd Psalm, "Even though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for Thou art with me," he said the Jews have never accepted that G-d can abandon us.

"The question is not where was G-d [during the Holocaust], but where were you, man?"

Rabbi Bulka told the standing-room only audience that the purpose G-d has for us is connected to the choices we are free to make.

"He says in Deuteronomy (Chapter 30): 'I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing; therefore choose life.' "

There is nothing wrong, Rabbi Bulka said, in in admitting that we do not understand G-d's actions or intentions.

What we do know, he said, is what G-d tells us in the Torah that he wants us to do.

Rabbi Saltzman countered that he sees G-d not as proscriptive, or interventionist, but as "a personality who knows me better than anyone else, who loves you for what you are. He is there to listen to me as I work through my problems."

He said that he does not see justice as part of the fabric of the world. "The only thing we [people] bring to the world is justice. In that, we are co-creators [of the world] with G-d."

G-d, he said, is the "commander of the chain of tradition of the Jewish people. That doesn't require a leap of faith — I try to base my theology on what I see as reality.

"I don't see myself as a knight of faith — I see myself as a knight of obedience. My job is to obey, not to believe."

While all three rabbis agreed that the question of life after death is not a major concern in Jewish theology, Rabbi Bulka praised researchers like Elizabeth Kubler-Ross and Ross Moody for "at least making it a talkable subject."

Rabbi Plaut said he believes that every action anyone does changes the world. "If I do the right thing, or fail to do the right thing, that changes the world. If the good that I have done is my immortality, then I'll be satisfied."

David Shiner acclaimed in North York

Klein says he has not accepted any donations from corporations or interest groups because municipal elections "are about the average person on the street."

Councillor David Shiner, elected in 1991 when he upset then-incumbent Bob Bradley, has been acclaimed in Ward 13. Shiner, 42, is the son of Esther Shiner, the late North York councillor.

Among Jewish candidates for public school trustee, there have been three acclamations: Errol Young in Ward 5, Gerri Gershon in Ward 8 and David Young in Ward 6. All are incumbents.

In Ward 9, popular incumbent Shelley Stillman faces a challenge from Nathan Shuster. David Caplan, currently trustee for Ward 14, will go up against Audrey Ormrod. In a replay of the 1991 election, veteran Ward 7 trustee Mae Waese will face repeat challenger Arnold Goodman. And Elsa Chandler, a one-time North York Board of Education chair, will face Harry Pappas in Ward 4.

Chai Folk Ensemble leader ends 31-year association

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Hillel Sommer's retirement as co-artistic director of the Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble last May marked the end of an era.

Sommer was there from the troup's founding in 1963. As a 3-year-old, he watched his mother, the late Sarah Sommer, put the original eight dancers through their paces in the family home.

On Nov. 5, the Ensemble and the Chai Folk Arts Council are hosting a dinner and dance in celebration of Sommer. Tickets will be limited to 150.

Sommer formally joined Chai in 1978 as a percussionist with the group's orchestra. He was Chai's musical director from 1985 to 1990 and again in 1992-93. He was co-artistic director since 1989 with Marshall Miller, and introduced many of the popular and ethnic musical styles that have become Chai's trademark.

Sommer said his young family and growing medical practice are behind his decision to retire. "It was a difficult decision," he said, "but I was being pulled from too many directions at once."

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

Studio Tour: Audiences were electrified when Al Jolson sang and delivered several lines of dialogue in the 1927 film The Jazz Singer. The innovation of sound in motion pictures, which spelled the ruin of silent films within a year, was the innovation of Warner Brothers — whose sprawling Hollywood studio is open for tours.

Humphrey Bogart, John Wayne, Jimmy Cagney and many other legendary movie actors came onto Warner sets to make such films as Casablanca, Green Berets and Yankee Doodle Dandy. Now visitors may visit the sets where these movies were made, and observe new movies and television shows (such as Murphy Brown, starring Candice Bergen) in the making.

The two-hour tour begins at the Visitors Centre with original prop and costume exhibits, a souvenir shop and a movie theatre where classic Warner Bros. film clips are shown. Then tour groups visit outdoor back lot sets, an indoor stound stage, craft and technical areas, the prop shop, the sound department and other areas.

The studio tour is given Monday to Friday, 9 a.m. to 4 p.m., and costs $27 (US) per person. Warner Brothers Studios, 4000 Warner Blvd., Burbank CA. (818) 954-1744.

More on California: Deep in the heart of a magnificent old-growth forest, an hour and a half south of the city of San Francisco, the last steam-powered passenger line offering daily service in America chugs along. On board the Roaring Camp and Big Trees Railroad, you pass through an awesome forest of giant California redwoods, some more than a thousand years old.

The 115-year-old train makes up to six daily scheduled runs from the Roaring Camp station in Felton, past Indian Creek and Grizzly Flats on the way to the top of Bear Mountain. At the Big Bear Station, passengers disembark to see a rare view of untamed California. Looking out over the top of the Welch Big Tree Grove, one sees the Pacific Ocean to the west, the wineries of Monterey and Carmel to the south, and the Santa Cruz Range to the north, along with the hustle and bustle of San Jose and Silicon Valley.

BOOKS

By BERNARD BASKIN

Crossing The Threshold Of Hope by his Holiness John Paul II (Random House of Canada $25)

This is the first commercial book ever written by a pope. It promises to be the major publishing event of the decade. Twenty million copies are available worldwide in 21 languages and in 35 countries.

Initially, the Pope planned to answer a series of questions posed by an Italian journalist in a TV interview. Instead, he decided to respond to the questions in written form, applying himself to the task whenever he found a brief respite from his regular activities.

Most of the 30 or so questions are theological, complex and difficult. They include the following: "Does God really exist? If God exists why is He hiding? Why is there so much evil in the world? Why so many religions? How are Judaism and the religions of Buddha and Islam to be regarded? What is the use of believing? What are authentic human rights? How does the Church regard women? Does eternal life exist?"

The answers are surprisingly brief, never more than a few pages in length. They quote liberally from papal encyclicals and include references to friends, books and personal experiences.

This widely heralded work contains few if any surprises. The Pope, not unexpectedly, articulates views that are conservative and familiar. Non-Christians will remain dubious and unconvinced when the Pope finds simple, satisfactory answers — in the life and death of Jesus — to such imponderables as God's existence, evil in the world and the hereafter. Others will find difficulty with the author's rather rambling style, his circular form of reasoning and reference to the ideas of philosphers old and new.

Racial hatred

In his discussion of Judaism the Pope deplores the concentration camps of World War II and the systematic extermination of those "who were condemned for no other reason than that they were Jewish." He writes, "Auschwitz, perhaps the most meaningful symbol of the Holocaust of the Jewish people, shows to what lengths a system constructed on principles of racial hatred and greed for power can go to this day. Auschwitz does not cease to admonish, reminding us that Anti-Semitism is a great sin against humanity."

In a significant passage, the Pope asserts that thanks to the initiative of Israel it has become possible to establish diplomatic relations between the Apostolic See and Israel. He adds, "It is important to reaffirm that I, myself, never had any doubts in this regard."

The Pope, despite his expression of warm feelings for Jews can't refrain from suggesting that the Hebrew scriptures are fulfilled in "The New Covenant" and point "to the One whom God would send in the fullness of time."

Only two pages are allotted to women. The Pope laments that in our culture woman has become, before all else an object of pleasure and maintains that, "A certain contemporary feminism finds its roots in the absence of true respect for women. An authentic theology of women will be realized when there is a return to the figure of Mary and devotion to her."

In these wide-ranging essays, the Pope takes a stand against capital punishment and abortion, encourages ecumenical dialogue, cautions Christians who welcome certain ideas from the religious traditions of the far East and encourages Christians not to be afraid because the power of faith is greater than any evil which man could or should fear.

The Pope is a controversial figure. But many Catholics and others will cherish this attractive volume as a source of inspiration and guidance. Non-Christians (and disaffected Catholics) will find it informative and not without valuable religious insights.

New play... A daring fable

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

David Warren (A.K.A. Death Waits)

TORONTO — David Warren is a 23-year-old Jewish playwright who writes under the arresting nom de plume of Death Waits.

He's already had several plays produced, and short stories and a volume of poetry published. His latest play, The Earth is a Witch, the Witch is a Saint, the Saint is Applause, has its world premiere at Theatre Passe Muraille Nov. 11 and runs to Dec. 4.

It is a daring fable about why some nuns become saints, others become witches and others are forgotten all together. "It's full of surprises," is about all its creator will say.

Though he is described as the enfant terrible of the Canadian stage because of the far-out nature of some of his work, Waits is a disarmingly friendly fellow, with twinkling eyes and a mop of sandy hair rising straight up from a broad forehead.

His knowledge of theatre goes far beyond his years. He concedes that his parents, Paula and Alan Warren, were far from happy with his unusual stage name of Death Waits. "They thought I was just going through a phase and it would pass."

Though he takes a lot of ribbing about the name from theatre colleagues, he has stuck with it because, as he points out, it has the possibility of infinity. One Toronto actor has adopted the name of Park Bench.

"My parents come to all my shows, but sometimes they don't think their friends would appreciate them. But this new play is one that they can safely bring their friends to."

Daniel Brooks, the Jewish writer and director who is directing Waits' latest play, has his own method of filtering his works for the friends of his mother, Naomi Brooks. "I get my mother to come to every opening night and pass her verdict along," he said.

Brooks and Waits have attracted six of Canada's best known women actors to the cast: Janet Burke, Clare Coulter, Maggie Huculak, Trisha Lamie, Nadia Ross and Tracy Wright.

Waits attended North Prep school in Forest Hill and Northern Secondary School. He works in graphic design, as an arts administrator and an art installer to help pay the bills.

Previews of the play begin Nov. 8. For information, call (416) 504-7529. Theatre Passe Muraille is at 16 Ryerson Ave., in the Bathurst-Queen area.

A fresh look at biblical mythology

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Jewish angels are not a usual subject matter for artists.

Nevertheless Lilian Broca, a Vancouver artist, seems perfectly at ease using Jewish angels to people her paintings and drawings.

Her show, Of Angels and Human Conditions, at the Jewish Community Centre's Zack Gallery, marked the opening of the new, adjacent professional performing arts facility, the Norman Rothstein Theatre.

Broca's fresh approach to Jewish biblical mythology has winged figures floating through the air. Couples make love. A solitary male sits in quiet contemplation.

There are Holocaust overtones in the anguish of some of the angels, in their emaciated, tortured bodies.

"I learned to draw in Romania, from sculptured plaster casts," Broca told The CJN. She works in acrylics, spackle and mixed media, on rag paper, and achieves a silver-sheened textured luminosity with graphite.

Romanian-born Lillian Broca got her bachelor of fine arts degree from Concordia University in Montreal and then went on to the Pratt Institute in New York for her masters.

She moved to Vancouver in 1971 shortly after graduation, and she has been a working artist here ever since. For 13 years she was on the faculty of Kwantlen College, teaching painting and drawing.

Broca's angels fly out of the Old Testament with intensity. They work hard on behalf of mankind. She says, "My angels represent the opposing forces of good and evil, which G-d placed within mankind, enabling us to shape our own will."

Like most Jews, she says, she was not familiar with "Judaic angelology," associating all angels with Christian religious paintings. But after reading a book by Rabbi Morris Margolies, a professor of Jewish history, she says, "I quickly became preoccupied with the subject matter."

Angels appear in the Old Testament, says Broca, in the Dead Sea Scrolls, and in other books dealing with religious themes, which were excluded from the canon by rabbis from the second century BCE to the first century CE. Broca said angels are mentioned in the Zohar and the Kabbalah, featured along with imps, demons and magic formulae.

The rabbis who banned reference to angels felt the stories about them could threaten G-d's Oneness and could become objects of adoration and worship, she said. Therefore Jewish teaching stresses that angels are not independent and depend on divine permission and divine will.

She said that "Rabbi Margolies believes G-d needs no angels but we mortals do, in order to narrow the chasm which separates us from G-d Himself." She describes angels as the metaphors of the yetzer ha-ra and yetzer tov — the evil and good inclination of every human being.

The artist has had solo shows in Montreal, Vancouver, Victoria, Toronto, Regina, New York, Seattle and San Francisco, as well as taking part in many group shows.

BILL GLADSTONE'S

EYE ON ARTS

The Way She Is: That's the teaser for a long, talky profile of Barbra Streisand, by Michael Shnayerson, that appears this month as the cover story in the glossy American magazine, Vanity Fair. The numerous photographs by Annie Leibovitz are just as appealing as the article — in which the immensely popular diva defends her occasional political pronouncements, far removed as they may be from the realm of music and entertainment.

"I don't give up my role as a citizen just because I'm a celebrity," explains Streisand, who supports the Middle East peace process to the extent that she attended the historic treaty-signing between Israel and Jordan last week. "In fact, I think it's the proper use of celebrity. If you believe in a cause, you can raise your voice and perhaps make a difference."

According to Vanity Fair, Streisand is preparing numerous scripts for production. One is The Mirror Has Two Faces, a romantic comedy about a platonic marriage between two college professors that evolves into a relationship of physical love. "I think I'm always drawn to films about the mystery of appearances. Yentl was certainly about that: what is male, what is female? Or in Nuts: what is sane, what is not sane? The Mirror Has Two Faces is a really charming love story. But it has serious overtones about vanity and beauty, the external versus the internal."

Musical programs

Last month, CDs and video and cassette tapes of Streisand's recent highly-publicized six-city concert tour were released. Their sale may add significantly to the roughly $50 million that she is alleged to have made, several million of which she donated to charity.

Klezmer music re-emerges

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Klezmer music, wiped out in Eastern Europe by the Holocaust, is gradually re-emerging in the United States. The revival, a source of satisfaction and joy to many, brings back a nostalgic brand of music that is vitally associated with Ashkenazi Jewish culture.

At once high-spirited and infectious, klezmer was played at celebrations — weddings and bar mitzvahs. At the height of its popularity, klezmer was the sound of music grassroots Jews liked best.

Klezmer's development, mainly in the United States, is documented in A Jumpin' Night In The Garden Of Eden, Michael Goldman's rousing 75-minute documentary. It will be screened on Vision TV on Monday, Nov. 14 at 9 p.m.

The film turns on two klezmer bands — Kapelye of New York and the Klezmer Conservatory Band of Boston — and their young enthusiastic leaders, Henry Sapoznik and Hankus Netsky, respectively.

Sapoznik and Netsky were not born into the klezmer tradition.

"When I was growing up I heard the music," said Sapoznik, who was originally a bluegrass musician. "But it bounced off me. It's not what I wanted to hear. I wanted to be an American."

He drifted into klezmer only after someone — a gentile — asked him a pointed question, "How come you people don't play your own music?"

Netsky discovered the wonders of klezmer by rummaging through a motherlode of old, dusty recordings from the 1920s in a relative's basement. Finding them, he felt like an archeologist who had accidentally stumbled upon a lost treasure trove.

As we learn from A Jumpin' Night In The Garden Of Eden klezmer was profoundly influenced by Romanian and Hungarian melodies. Often, it was performed by itinerant bands. In case you're wondering, klezmer is a derivative of the Hebrew words klay zemer, or instruments of song.

The film is an amalgam of images: Kapelye and the Klezmer Conservatory Band belting out catchy numbers, much to the delight of their disparate audiences. Sapoznik seeking out old pros — notably Dave Tarras — who recalls klezmer's heyday in the 1920s. Band members, including an African-American, reflecting on their careers.

A Jumpin' Night In The Garden Of Eden conveys with panache the essence of klezmer — our precious legacy. It's a film you won't want to miss.

Performing arts facility opens in Vancouver

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Norman Rothstein Theatre, Vancouver's newest professional performing arts facility, is part of the recently reconstructed Vancouver Jewish Community Centre (JCC).

The 350-seat theatre, which opened officially on Oct. 19, is not just an "upgraded auditorium," said a JCC official. It's designed for the presentation of dance, music, theatre and film.

There's a complete professional sound and lighting system, a full-size movie screen and commercial projector, dressing rooms and a grand piano.

Wheelchair accessible

The two dressing rooms have banks of well-lit dressing tables and costume racks and are equipped with "show feed" to allow performers to hear what's happening on stage and listen for their cues.

The theatre is air conditioned and has wheelchair accessibility for four wheelchairs. On-site parking is available.

The theatre is named as a memorial to Norman Rothstein, a civic-minded businessman and philanthropist. Vancouver-born Rothstein, a graduate of the University of British Columbia, was the son of Abraham Rothstein, who immigrated to Canada from Russia in the early 1890s. The Rothstein family had a strong commitment to Zionism and Jewish education, especially the Talmud Torah.

Norman Rothstein has been active in the United Jewish Appeal's national division and in the Vancouver Jewish Federation.

Always interested in the arts, he established Ein Hod, an artists' colony in Israel, in memory of his father. A founding member of the Vancouver Playhouse Theatre, he has been on the boards of the Vancouver International Festival and the Vancouver Art Gallery, as well as a patron of the Vancouver Symphony and Vancouver Opera.

The opening nights of the theatre featured a concert by pianist Anton Kuereti and cellist Kristine Bogyo. The first major event held there was the Western conference of Canadian Jewish Congress.

On Nov. 12 Carousel Theatre will present Goodbye Marianne, the story of a young girl's experience in fleeing Hitler's Germany to freedom in Canada. On Nov. 15, one of Israel's leading writers, Amos Oz, will speak on Israel Through Its Literature. The Judith Marcuse Dance Company will perform on Nov. 26 and 27.

The theatre, at 950 W. 41st Ave., is available for bookings. For information call the JCC at (604) 257-5111.

Four Seasons Regent

Isadore Sharp

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

'The hotel deal of the century'

TORONTO — After six months of searching for a major investor and possible successor, Toronto's celebrated hotelier, Isadore Sharp, has found his prince.

Sharp, chair and founder of the posh Four Seasons Regent international chain of luxury hotels, has made a deal, effective this week, through which Saudi Prince Al-Walid Bin Talal Bin Abdulaziz Al Saud pays $165 million (Cdn) to acquire 25 per cent of the company's shares.

As well, the 40-year-old billionaire prince, a nephew of Saudi King Fahd, will put up another $100 million to buy luxury hotels for Four Seasons Regent to manage, beginning with a property he is developing in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia.

Al-Walid, who made an estimated $4 billion during the Saudi oil boom of the 1980s, is no stranger to Western investment. In recent years, he has purchased a $590-million (US) chunk of Citycorp, the big U.S. bank, as well as substantial interests in EuroDisney, Sak's Fifth Avenue and the San Francisco-based Fairmont hotel chain, owned by the Jewish Swig family.

Sharp, who met with Al-Walid aboard his yacht off the French Riviera, still retains control of the company he founded more than three decades ago in Toronto with an astonishingly ordinary motel on Jarvis Street, since demolished.

The company's second property, the Inn On The Park Hotel at Eglinton Avenue East and Leslie Street, stands today as a midtown institution, and is widely regarded as one of Toronto's finest deluxe hotels.

"The result of this transaction is exactly what I hoped to achieve and fully satisfies the objectives I laid out initially, which involved my personal estate planning and stabilizing Four Seasons for the long term," Sharp told The CJN in an exclusive interview.

At 63, he has now shelved any talk of retirement for the foreseeable future.

"I expect to continue to do what I'm doing as long as I enjoy doing it. Eventually, there will be an orderly succession so as to maintain continuity and stability in the company."

Although Four Seasons Regent shares were trading at about $16.50 before the deal was announced, Al-Walid has offered to pay $22 per share for his quarter-stake in the company, thereby putting roughly $22 million into Sharp's pocket.

(The sum, says Sharp, has resolved problems connected to the planning of his personal estate.)

With some 30 million public shares outstanding, estimates of the company's worth range from $500 to $700 million, according to executive vice-president H. Roger Garland.

Charles Henry, a consultant of Al-Walid in New York, said the prince is interested in capital-intensive, global businesses with strong built-in brand name recognition.

"We see long-term value there which the market wasn't recognizing," he said of the prince's investment in the Four Seasons Regent chain.

Although one is a Jew and the other an Arab, Sharp and Al-Walid seem to share certain distinguishing traits. True, the innkeeper does not live in a 130-room mansion nor own a 737 Boeing jet aircraft as the Saudi prince does, but both are self-made men who started with small amounts of capital ($15,000 US in Al-Walid's case) which each parlayed into a vast, farflung empire. As well, both seem to have the same high regard for well-managed, brand name companies with secure reputations and global outlooks.

With some 45 properties worldwide and several more in the works, the Four Season Regent chain is regarded as the pre-eminent luxury and business hotel chain in the world. It provides a level of customer satisfaction that comes a close second to that of the U.S. Ritz-Carlton luxury hotel chain, according to the July issue of Consumer Reports.

The multimillion dollar hotel empire was built slowly, deal by deal, by a man who inherited immense drive and determination from his Polish-born father, Max Sharp, now 94.

Part of the money for the company's early growth came from Sharp's brother-in-law, furrier Eddie Creed of the now-defunct Creed's Ltd., and from a druggist friend of Creed's — Murray Koffler, founding chair of Shoppers Drug Mart.

London's Inn on the Park was Isadore Sharp's first foreign venture and — despite much industry skepticism that anyone could make it profitable — his first international success. More hotel construction and acquisition followed, but it was not until the 1980s that Sharp recognized the company could manage privately-owned hotels for a flat fee, thereby decreasing the company's financial risk while allowing it to hone its specialized hotel management and marketing skills.

Typically, the company attains a 10 to 20 per cent stake in any hotel it manages.

By the summer of 1992, Four Seasons owned or managed some 23 hotels around the world, including The Pierre in New York, the Clift in San Francisco, the Ritz-Carlton in Chicago, and the Four Seasons Resort in Nevis, West Indies. Then, in a move which Maclean's magazine hailed as "the hotel deal of the century," Four Seasons paid $122 million to take over about a dozen properties in the financially ailing Regent chain, which was as well-known and well-respected in Asia as Four Seasons had become in North America.

"As far as I'm concerned, Four Seasons has done something that literally no other Canadian company has done," Ira Gluskin, president of the Toronto-based investment firm Gluskin Sheff & Associates, Inc., told the Financial Post Magazine in 1992. "They have produced a world-wide quality product."

Acquiring Regent gave Four Seasons a solid foothold in the Asian market, which Sharp sees as crucial in the coming century. "Asia is going to be such a dominant part of the world economy that you have to have inroads there."

Meanwhile, the company expanded with new hotels in Carlsbad, Cal., Scottsdale, Ariz., Paris, Puerto Rico, Singapore, Tokyo and two locations in Hawaii.

As well, it took over construction on what was supposed to have been a new Regent Hotel on 57th Street in Manhattan. Designed by renowned architect I.M. Pei, the architecturally striking structure is achieving a sterling reputation as the Four Seasons, New York.

Despite its charmed growth, Four Seasons has not been immune to the major setbacks that have affected the tourism industry throughout the '90s. To a lesser extent than many of its competitors, the company has experienced losses.

According to the Wall Street Journal, the company's debts as of June 30 amounted to $378 million (Cdn), a figure the chain's Toronto-based management hopes to cut almost in half by selling seven hotels.

"We had two or three tough years in the pit of the recession," said John B. Richards, senior vice-president of marketing and planning. "In 1991 and 1992, due to the Gulf War and corporate restructuring, the travel business experienced two of its worst years since WWII. But that is substantially behind us now, and the company is experiencing almost a boom period. This arrangement with Prince Al-Walid is clearly a signal as to the long-term prospects of the company."

In spite of the red ink that has sullied its balance sheets, the Four Seasons Regent chain continues to expand. Mexico, Djakarta, Chiang Mai (in northern Thailand), Istanbul, Berlin and Prague are among the localities where hotels have already opened or are slated for opening by the end of 1996.

The company, said Richards, intends to focus on areas where it is presently under-represented, such as Europe and Latin America.

And, of course, the Middle East. Under the prince's tutelage, a new property is under development in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, and more are planned for Cairo and the Arab emirate countries of Dubai, Abu Dhabi and Bahrain.

"We anticipate having a hotel in Israel," Richards said. "We don't have any current prospects but it's logical to assume that we'll be in Israel before too long."

A prominent member of Toronto's Jewish community and a longtime supporter of Israel, Sharp sees no potential source of conflict in dealing with a loyal Arab of the Saudi royal family. "It's not something that we discussed," he said.

"Each of us in his own way has determined it is not anything that would stand in the way of our working together. I think both of us understand what we're doing is building a bridge of peace."

Cooking school targets healthy eating

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The 1990s idea of "cocooning" comes from the baby boom generation, exhausted from protesting wars, the rape of the environment and prejudice, having turned inward and making their homes a refuge filled with VCRs, CD players, giant TV screens and potted plants.

Having created a welcoming nest, experts say, they are also turning to cooking.

Gone (or at least, much less popular), are the days of TV dinners, fast food and even, so the most current reports say, microwaves.

Coupled with this trend is the focus on healthy foods, heavy on grains, fruits and vegetables and low on fats.

Hence the proliferation of cooking schools that teach not only to how to cook, but also what to cook.

Eta Brand is serving both needs with her Back to Basics School of Cooking and Health Emporium, attached to the Kosher Food Warehouse on Doncaster Avenue in Thornhill.

Brand came to Toronto from Johannesburg, South Africa, in 1989.

She says she was interested in cooking "since I was able to stand and watch my mother," but trained as a medical technologist and worked in hospital labs.

"I come to my classes from a medical perspective," she said. "I want to help people make changes in their diet from a disease-prevention point of view.

"I take a holistic approach. [Health comes from] eating healthy foods, lowering stress and exercise."

Eta Brand

When she first came to Canada, Brand sold medical equipment to researchers.

Through market research, she came to realize there was no one teaching people about healthy eating and cooking, particularly if one kept kosher.

Brand says she uses only kosher products and techniques in her school. It is not particularly Jewish cooking, she stresses, but healthy food that is kosher.

"My focus is on promoting foods from the plant kingdom, since it has been proven that that is a healthier way to eat."Some classes include fish or dairy products.

Recipes are low in fat, with an emphasis on grains, as recommended in the new Canada Food Guide.

As well, "I use a variety of herbs, spices and flavorings. If food doesn't taste good and look good, don't bother."

The part-time classes have grown into a proper teaching unit, with a counter, overhead mirror and all the accessories of a cooking school.

Classes, taught by Brand herself or by others expert in their areas, are held every evening of the week (except Friday), and include basic cooking techniques, breadmaking, low-fat sauces and pastas, vegetarian cooking (including a vegetarian Shabbat meal), low-fat Italian, Indian and oriental cooking, and healthy desserts.

She even has such helpful classes as "Help! My child is a vegetarian," designed for bemused parents whose children announce they won't eat anything that used to have a face on it.

Brand also helps those with food sensitivities to wheat, milk or preservatives.

She recognizes that getting children to eat healthy foods is a challenge, and has a special course on "how to encourage your child to explore the color, smell taste and texture of nutritious foods."

Courses are reasonably priced and gift certificates are available.

This week The CJN features ...George Klein Creations

By LORI DENNIS

TORONTO — Since 1957, when George Klein arrived in Toronto from his native Hungary, all he can remember wanting to do was design jewelry.

A few years later, he went to work as an apprentice in the trade, and for the past 28 years, he's been doing what comes naturally to him — creating beautiful and unusual jewelry designs.

In a comfortable, tightly secured, 650-square-foot showroom, located upstairs from Steeles Heights Plaza at Bayview and Steeles, George Klein Creations has been serving the Thornhill and Toronto communities for the past 12 years.

He says that 80 per cent of his time and business is focused on designing custom pieces, mostly for a professional clientele including doctors and lawyers.

While he prefers to design modern, abstract (what he calls "wild and elaborate") pieces with sharp angles and unusual features that "always attract attention." he also offers his clientele a wide selection of more classic and traditional jewelry designs.

"When a client comes to me, we spend the first hour or so in consultation. I get to know them, their tastes and preferences, and together we look at different styles and designs," he says.

"I make it a policy never, ever to push them into making a decision. In fact, they can come back to see me three or four times before they place their order.

"Ninety-five per cent of my customers are return customers which says to me that my clientele is happy. So I guess this approach works," he says.

While the jewelry business is very much a copycat business, Klein prefers to create original designs.

"I look at the high fashion magazines for inspiration but I prefer to be adventurous and different — always keeping my pieces at a level of what is considered to be good taste," he says.

Aside from custom-made rings, bracelets, necklaces and the like, Klein also has a large selection of bar and bat mitzvah gifts which start at $25.

In general, his prices tend to be far below retail. (He doesn't like the term wholesale because it implies a lesser quality.) With the price of gold having gone up in the past two years, his prices have been affected, of course, but have always stayed within market range.

Before long, Klein plans to open a new division of his business in the same location, featuring a collection of miniature sculptures. Made of silver and accented with 18-karat gold, they are limited edition decorative pieces which include abstracts, nude figures and art deco sculptures ranging in price from $500 to $3,000.

B.C. government aids newcomers

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — The British Columbia government is spending more money to help establish newcomers, says Premier Mike Harcourt.

The premier, speaking at an open house sponsored by the Affiliation of Multiculturalism and Service Agencies of B.C., with which the Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region is affiliated, announced an extra $500,000 for immigrant services, bringing this year's budget to $2.5 million.

"Priority will be given to issues identified by the multicultural community, including youth at risk, language needs and women," Harcourt said.

The premier said he favors consultation with the people who work day in and day out with new British Columbians, and announced an additional in $750,000 core funding for immigrant serving agencies.

"It is a priority," he said, "to help ease the difficult transition immigrant families face in integrating into our society. This type of support is best delivered by grassroots organizations and the core funding will assist these community-based efforts."

Israel tops in 'edutainment'

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — All indications are that the 21st century will see the People of the Book become the People of the Notebook.

Without fanfare, a handful of Israeli companies are making a name for themselves in the educational software field.

Menahem Hasfari, CEO of EduSoft, Israel's largest educational software house, feels that the country's educational system provides a good deal of support. He gives special weight to the fact that "this was the first country to implement a national-scale project to introduce computers in the schools."

Israel also has the highest percentage of computers in the home, he says, 45 per cent at last count. "The Education Ministry has allocated $100 million to equip all schools with computers and educational software, with a ratio of one computer per 10 students. Compared to the stated U.S. goal of one to 20, this is the highest rate in the world."

Veteran American educational software expert Bill Bowman says that with peace will come more world interest in tapping the well of talent in Israel. "Excluding the United States, Israel is number one," he says simply. "For a country of five million it's an amazing achievement.

"Somehow over here," he says, "you have people who are absolute experts in both the areas of technology and content, who can take that content and express it in a software environment."

This ability, says Bowman, is the basic difference between Israeli software manufacturers and their U.S. counterparts. Because there was no huge infrastructure of software development as in the United States, Bowman says, "you had to do it yourself."

For example, he says, Logal founder Dov Levin "wanted to interest his kids in physics, so he wrote his own software."

Another reason for the overall high level of technical knowledge on the part of software creators is service in the IDF. "Anyone in the Air Force spends a lot of time in simulators," says Bowman, "and that happens to tie in nicely with an educational trend of getting away from tutorials where computers ask questions. Instead, kids ask the computer questions."

Bowman became aware of Israelis in the educational software field when he founded his first educational software company in the mid-1980s. "At the time," he says, "I was amazed at how many Israeli companies kept popping up."

When he was approached by Yoel Givol, CEO of the Galilee-based Logal, he says, "I was blown away by the quality and depth of simulation. It was an interesting wake-up call which planted a seed in my mind."

The seed grew. Today, funded by Gemini, PEC, Apple and others, Logal's U.S. operation is headed by Bowman.

Logal recently closed two major U.S. deals: a $130,000 sale to schools in Maryland and a $45,000 sale to the Providence school district.

EduSoft, a Degem subsidiary, showed $1.5 million in net profits on $9 million in sales for 1993. The company offers an extensive software line serving pupils from kindergarten-age to adult, combining interactive multimedia technology with prevailing pedagogical methods in subjects ranging from science and technology to language learning.

EduSoft's series for preschoolers (or special education needs) teaches computer activities on a special keyboard with six large keys.

Children are first taught a specific concept by manipulating 3-D shapes, which is then reinforced in the abstract. Again, Hasfari credits the educational system as "our laboratory. All our pedagogical input, all development and testing is done in Israel."

Culturally sensitive

One major stumbling block in educational software is that education is culturally sensitive. "It's very difficult to transfer [lessons] from culture to culture," says Logal's Bowman, "but folks over here have done a good job of fitting in."

Development of a product with universal appeal is made easier, comments Hasfari, "when you have teachers who come from all over the world." Additional Israeli advantages, he says, are: "more mileage from every dollar spent on R&D; the hi-tech environment; and the fact that Israeli companies are ready to go to the ends of the earth."

His own company - with a firm foothold in South American, European and American markets - has now cast its eye towards the Far East, "our strategic market for the next three to four years."

Overall growth is impressive for those companies geared towards the school market. Further proof: Edunetics, based in Herzliya, announced last week it had won a $1 million project to provide software to six primary schools in the Michigan area.

This past summer the company won a tender to provide the Niagara Falls city school system with $2.85 million in integrated eductional software over the next three years.

Another dominant trend is making its presence felt, that of endowing all educational software products, whether for school or home use, with entertainment value.

"This is the arcade-game generation," explains Hasfari. "Everything you give them should be developed as a multimedia adventure game." Such educational entertainment is called "edutainment."

Only a few Israeli companies have gone into creating software exclusively for the home market. One hopeful contender for the U.S. edutainment market is EduConcept, a Taldor Computer Systems subsidiary which signed an agreement this summer for U.S. marketing and distribution through Maxis, developers of the popular SimCity, SimLife, SimAnt and other games.

Maxis has placed an initial $300,000 order for EduConcept's educational multimedia products. The Kiryat Ono-based EduConcept is a start-up company, barely six months old.

"Never say the same thing twice," says EduConcept project manager Anna Neeman. The trick in edutainment is to find the balance between the game and the subject of study. EduConcept's package ties music, art, math and the social sciences together through the adventures of space-creature Zaark and his Night Team. Users aged six to nine gain entry to the gang, which helps them throughout their adventures.

EduConcept does not present the educational program on the basis of separate disciplines, explains Neeman, "as sometimes the child does not even know he is entering into a discipline until he is involved. This is our unique approach."

The company's advantage, she says, is how it presents subjects, its high-quality computer graphics and the fine caliber of its staff. EduConcept's founders, Neeman and Linda Harnevo, both have backgrounds as educators; Neeman, who taught high school for over two decades, says field experience is vital.

"You have to stand in the classroom in order to know what the child wants, not rely only on surveys, but also on the instincts you have."

TIPS FROM PROS

By YARON HAIK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For anyone turning 71, it's time to ask an important question: how will you convert your Registered Retirement Savings Plan (RRSP) into the best income for the remainder of your life?

The options used to be fairly simple. You could withdraw your entire RRSP in cash, buy an annuity, or transfer the RRSP into a Registered Retirement Income Fund (RRIF).

The first choice is the most unattractive since cashing in an RRSP creates a heavy tax bill. The second — buying an annuity — guarantees a regular income for the rest of the owner's life, but doesn't guard against inflation. The third, rolling your RRSP into a RRIF, is now more than ever the most attractive option.

In a recent budget, the federal government dramatically altered the rules governing RRIFs, a tax- sheltered plan that provides periodic payments to the investor for life. Under the new rules, a RRIF owner's minimum payment formula is guided by the percentage table attached, wherein payments are gradually increased over the lifetime of the owner.

At age 94 the minimum payment of 20 per cent of remaining plan value will continue for the remainder of the investors' life.

Fixed income returns

The advantages of owning a RRIF are fairly evident, but there is more. When buying an annuity, payments are based on fixed-income returns. A RRIF, on the other hand, can be invested in a variety of growth or balanced investments such as mutual funds, stocks, bonds and GICs among other things.

Furthermore, a RRIF allows you to withdraw whatever amount is required, thus allowing more flexibility for payments should the need arise for more funds. An annuity doesn't offer the flexibility for payments and it may not leave any funds to pass on to a spouse or heirs. A RRIF may pass into the hands of a spouse if the owner elects to do so.

With greater growth potential, tax advantages and flexibility, now is the time to consider a RRIF. Talk to your investment advisor to discover how a RRIF can be tailored to fit your retirement income needs.

Immigration changes draw mixed reviews

By RON CSILLAG and BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporters

TORONTO — While many minority and women's groups continue to turn thumbs down to the sweeping changes in Canada's immigration system announced last week, national Jewish organizations are being more guarded, greeting the new directions with mixed reviews.

Canada's Jewish community has traditionally opposed any changes that would limit the reunification of families or place undue hardship on new arrivals. Despite fears to the contrary, the document unveiled by Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi — panned by many activists — will have little immediate impact on Jewish immigration to Canada.

But in the long term, according to Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), they could discourage Jewish immigration here with their calls for fewer overall immigrants, fewer family-class arrivals and a policy that seems to tell newcomers they must expect to quickly become part of the community.

Marchi's plans call for:

- A target of 190,000 to 215,000 immigrants, down from the projected 230,000 this year;
- A shift toward attracting "economic" immigrants — those with skills and/or wealth — and away from family class. Projections for this year point to 43 per cent of immigrants in the economic class and 51 per cent in family class; that's expected to change by the year 2000 to 53 per cent economic and 44 per cent family;
- Boosting the number of refugees to between 24,000 and 32,000;
- Shifting settlement costs away from government to immigrants or agencies, meaning the Jewish community could be expected to take up the financial slack;
- Knowledge of English or French;
- Forcing sponsors of family members to put up assets, such as homes or businesses, as guarantees to ensure newcomers don't go on welfare;
- And a separate category for parents and grandparents, with possible limits.

The vast majority of Jewish immigrants to Canada are from the former Soviet Union, and they usually come with needed skills in areas like computer, physical sciences and engineering, Davis noted.

But a large majority — 80 per cent over the last two years — have accepted entry-level or unrelated menial work, which is contrary to Ottawa's plan. "The government wants short-term success," Davis said. " They want the skilled worker who can hit the ground running."

Potential Jewish immigrants to Canada could also be scared off by demands for English or French. Former Soviets tends to have "fair to good" English and little or no French, Davis pointed out.

Mordechai Ben-Dat named CJN Editor

The Board of Directors of The Canadian Jewish News announces the appointment of Mordechai Ben-Dat as Editor.

Ben-Dat, who has been a contributor to the pages of the paper for some time and has been one of its editorial writers, comes from a varied background which encompasses social work, the practice of law, speech writing and government service at several levels. He will assume his new duties on December 12.

Ben-Dat fills the vacancy created when Patricia Rucker was appointed to the Immigration and Refugee Board of Canada. A profile on the new Editor will appear in the next issue of The CJN.

News In Brief Everywhere

CANADA

Finestone in Israel

MONTREAL — Sheila Finestone, the Secretary of State for Multiculturalism and the Status of Women, is in Israel for the International Jewish Women's Conference, from Nov. 7-12.

The conference is intended to prepare women for the 1995 World Conference on Women, in Beijing.

Finestone will address the conference and is scheduled to hold talks with Israeli Arabs, Palestinian women, cabinet ministers and MKs.

On her return, she will stop in Germany for talks with leaders of the Jewish community on the Canadian experience with multiculturalism.

Pearlson Returned

TORONTO — Rabbi Jordan Pearlson was re-elected national president of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University at the group's annual general meeting, held recently in Toronto.

Reuben Croll of Montreal was elected senior vice-president; Sidney Chelsky and Nani Beutel, both of Toronto, were named treasurer and secretary respectively.

Rabbi Pearlson announced a mission to Europe and Israel next May so that participants can take part in celebrations marking the university's 25th anniversary.

ISRAEL

Crossings Limited

JERUSALEM — Israelis who do not hold foreign passports will be allowed to visit Jordan starting in mid-November, but only 500 Israelis a day will be permitted entry.

Tourism Ministry spokeswoman Orly Doron said recently that the restriction was due to Jordan's limited number of hotel rooms, and that only a certain number of tourists a day could visit the ancient rock city of Petra.

Help for Girl

JERUSALEM — No sooner was the ink dry on the peace treaty with Jordan than Israel said it will try to save a 12-year-old Jordanian girl who needs a bone-marrow transplant.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin gave the go-ahead for about $7,000 to be spent on tests to find a donor for Heba Shaban, whose father turned to Rabin and Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital for help in treating the girl's critical case of anemia.

Satellite Venture

TEL AVIV — Russia and the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa have agreed to a joint venture to launch a satellite into space in 1995.

After a five-member Russian delegation arrived here to finalize details, the agreement was signed last week between the Technion and the Russian STC Complex.

The $3.5 million satellite, to be used for communications and scientific experiments, is scheduled for launch in March, along with two other satellites from a site about 560 miles from Moscow.

Funds For HUC

JERUSALEM — The Hebrew Union College's Jewish Institute of Religion received an allocation of $70,000 (U.S.) from Israel's Religious Affairs Ministry late last week, marking the first time the school, founded in Jerusalem in 1963, received a government grant.

The allocation comes as a result of a June agreement given the force of a High Court of Justice verdict, whereby the ministry will begin funding non-Orthodox religious groups.

Affirmative Action Ruling

JERUSALEM — In a precedent-setting decision on affirmative action, Israel's High Court of Justice last week canceled the appointments of three male directors of government companies, saying those slots should have been filled with women.

The petition challenged the appointments of a man to the boards of the Ports and Railways Authority and of two men to the board of Israel Oil Refineries.

There are no women on either board.

Arab Population Grows

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem's Arab population continues to grow faster than its Jewish one, according to a recent municipal report.

Non-Jews — mainly Arabs — made up some 28.3 percent of Jerusalem residents at the end of 1993, the report stated. In 1992, the figure for non-Jews was 27.9 per cent.

In 1967, 74.2 per cent of the population was Jewish and 25.8 per cent non-Jewish In 1993, the Jewish population was 71.7 per cent.

Aliyah Increases

JERUSALEM — Aliyah is up three percent so far this year compared to last year, and up 21 per cent last month over October 1993, the Absorption Ministry announced last week. In the first 10 months of the year, some 65,200 immigrants arrived, including 53,560 from the CIS. In October, 8,100 immigrants arrived, 7,000 of them from the former Soviet Union.

Opera Opens Doors

TEL AVIV — Local and international opera stars tested the rafters during the Oct. 23 opening of Israel's first opera house, a $50-million (U.S.), 1,500-seat auditorium built for the New Israeli Opera company.

The company, with the Israel Symphony Orchestra as its house orchestra, will perform Boris Godunov, Nabucco, The Barber of Seville, The Marriage of Figaro and Israeli composer Josef Tal's Joseph this season.

WORLD

Community Marks 100th

BULAWAYO — The Jewish community of Bulawayo, Zimbabwe, recently marked its 100th anniversary.

The Chief Rabbi of South Africa, Cyril Harris, speaking at both a thanksgiving service in the Bulawayo synagogue and at the 100th anniversary banquet, paid tribute to the 500-member Jewish community for "succeeding in preserving vibrant Jewish life."

While the community in Bulawayo has thrived in Zimbabwe, formerly known as Rhodesia, Jewish life has not fared as well in the capital city, Harare, where the 470 members of the community have witnessed divisive splits in recent years. At present, it has no rabbi.

Flap Over Germany

AMSTERDAM — Germany will not take part in Holland's commemoration of its World War II victims, to be held May 4, 1995, or in the May 5 ceremonies marking the 50th anniversary of the liberation of the Netherlands in 1945.

But Germany will take part in a Dutch commemoration scheduled for May 8, 1945, which marks the 50th anniversary of the surrender of the German army.

Holland's Jewish community recently said it was opposed to inviting Germany to next year's commemorations.

STREET KIDS: A Jewish problem?

First of a two-part series

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Street kids are a big problem, but not a Jewish problem as such," says Gordon Wolfe, executive director of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS).

He estimates the organization's caseload of street kids at 12 to 15 per year. The number of Jewish street kids who aren't in the system is unknown.

Statistics provided by the Interagency Committee on Homeless and Runaway Youth, a Toronto task force, indicate that 10,000 young people a year — both locals and out-of-towners — end up on the streets of Metropolitan Toronto.

At any time, 3,000 to 4,000 of them sleep in abandoned buildings, on rooftops, in parking garages, apartment stairwells, bank machine lobbies or on the street.

As a child protection agency, JF&CS is contacted by police when they pick up children under the age of 16 on the street. Once youngsters reach their 16th birthday, they are free to stay on the streets. Unless they're caught by police for breaking the law, older Jewish street teens usually remain unknown to JF&CS.

While most experts agree that the percentage of Jewish street kids is small, the problems facing them are big ones.

"A good half" of all street kids become involved in crimes like robbery, breaking and entering, assault or prostitution — sometimes simply to avoid hunger, says ex-Torontonian Dr. Saul Levine, director of child and adolescent psychiatry at the University of California at San Diego.

"Although most teens who leave home do so because of escalating conflicts, those who stay on the street usually have additional problems, such as depression, chronic behavioral difficulties or drug abuse, said Levine in a telephone interview.

Grant Lowery, a vice-president of the Toronto YMCA and one of Toronto's first outreach workers over 20 years ago, estimates that at least 25 per cent of street kids have left home because of physical or sexual abuse. Others are thrill-seekers or have been thrown out by their families. Over 20 per cent are lesbian, gay or bisexual.

He cautions, however, that the lifestyle "is not pretty." Some of the perils — AIDS, violence, sexually transmitted diseases and infections caused by drug abuse — are life-threatening.

"It's getting more dangerous as weapons and drugs permeate the scene," says Levine. "There are fewer second chances."

"Street kids are away from medical care, structure, and adults who are concerned about them. It's a much riskier lifestyle," says Simon Kalkstein, supervisor of JF&CS's Bloor Y branch, which is close to the downtown core where many street kids congregate.

Kalkstein, who sits on the Toronto task force dealing with street youth, has had a caseload of perhaps half a dozen street kids in the past four years. (Because of the small caseload shared by JF&CS's

Help is just a call away

In Toronto, most agencies that work with street kids, with the exception of Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS), are not Jewish agencies.

JF&CS can offer a safe place to stay, financial assistance, and assistance in going back to school and reconciling with family, says Simon Kalkstein, supervisor of JF&CS's Bloor Y branch.

There are Jewish family service agencies in eight Canadian cities. They can be reached by phone at the following numbers:

- Calgary 403-287-3510
- Edmonton 403-424-6346
- Hamilton 905-527-8444
- Montreal 514-342-0000
- Ottawa 613-722-4124 (adolescents and children), 613-789-1800 (adults)
- Toronto 416-638-7800
- Vancouver 604-257-5151
- Winnipeg 204-949-6875 (South End), 204-949-6860 (North End)

Street kids in other cities may wish to contact the local Children's Aid Society.

Help may also be found by contacting Tel-Aide, Toronto's Jewish distress line at 416-636-9610. Its hours are Monday to Thursday, 9:30 a.m. to 10 p.m.; Fridays 9:30 a.m. to 3 p.m.; and occasional Sundays.

Montreal's Jewish distress line, the Shalom Line, can be reached at 514-343-4343 Monday through Thursday from 4:30 p.m. to 10:30 p.m. and on Sundays from 10:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m.

The CJN's new look

Nothing old
Something new . . .
Nothing borrowed
Something blue . . . and red and green and yellow

That's what we told you in several editions leading to this launch of our "New Look." We now introduce The CJN's broadest design change since our conversion to a tabloid format more than a dozen years ago.

The addition of full process color to the front page every week, a detailed index to showcase The CJN's strong editorial coverage and a dedicated position for the mailing label, which will no longer cover the distinctive masthead logo — of which we are justly proud — were key elements we wanted to introduce when CJN management and staff embarked on this total redesign this spring.

"We want our readers not only to be impressed with our 'New Look,' but also to know where they will regularly find local news and what's happening elsewhere in Canada, in Israel and in the rest of the world. We have, therefore, created the exciting and distinct sections Here and There and Everywhere. At the same time, we have taken steps to make the paper even more readable and attractive," said CJN President Donald Carr.

"If there was one major aim running through all of our planning, it was to retain the strong traditional design points of The CJN as a newspaper, such as our distinctive logo, while updating and refreshing as many areas of the paper as possible," said CJN General Manager Gary Laforet.

Many of the changes you will now see, from more local news up front and larger body type throughout, to cleaner, crisper headlines and brighter presentation of our feature opinion pieces, are the result of feedback from our readers.

Some of the new elements introduced today are also aimed at making life a little easier for our advertisers.

"We think our clients can't help but benefit from being part of a more colorful, updated format," said Advertising Manager Vera Gillman. "And there are also some other direct benefits.

"We have had many requests over the years for small page-top ads from both large and small advertisers. We now have them. We have also gone to a five-column nationally standardized modular format, appreciated by many retailers and most advertising agencies."

Like any other publication, The CJN is constantly exploring ways to improve, not only in our format, but also in our content. We hope you enjoy our "New Look." We welcome your reactions.

Students protest terrorism

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — About 200 University and high school students from Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto marched from Parliament Hill to the embassy of the Islamic Republic of Iran last week to protest Canada's continued diplomatic relations with a country alleged to support international terrorism.

They called on the Canadian government to take meaningful action against Iran, which has been connected to terrorist bombings in Buenos Aires, London, the World Trade Centre in New York and most recently, a bus bombing in downtown Tel Aviv that killed 22.

"There are ways that we in Canada, with the support of our government, can stop the needless bloodshed," Carleton University graduate student Corey Goldman told the crowd gathered at the eternal flame in front of the Parliament Buildings. "International sanctions must be imposed against countries that support active terrorist organizations."

Elected representatives from several political parties also addressed the students and condemned state-supported terrorist activities.

A letter calling for sanctions was sent to Andre Ouellet, minister of foreign affairs, by Irving Abella, president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), and Moshe Ronen, chair of the national Israel affairs committee for CJC.

"Canadian Jewish Congress is requesting that the government of Canada investigate Iran's connection to terrorist activities," the letter said. "We believe that diplomatic relations should not be maintained with any country which supports international terrorism."

After demonstrating on Parliament Hill, the students marched the eight blocks to the embassy of the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, CJC Quebec region executive chair, accused Iran of using its embassies as a cover for terrorist activities. Shouting through a megaphone across the street from the embassy, Rabbi Poupko wondered why the Canadian government continues treating Iranian diplomats so graciously.

"Its diplomats continue to be invited to all the diplomatic receptions in Ottawa. And they're smiled at and their hands are shaken and they're treated as normal civilized citizens . . . [Yet] they represent a people which believes their ticket to heaven is the blood of Jews," he yelled.

To cheers and clapping, Rabbi Poupko crossed the street to deliver a bill of indictment listing Iran's crimes. It was slipped under the door of the embassy.

A lone representative of the embassy watched the demonstration from the sidewalk and handed out press releases denying Iran's involvement with Islamic fundamentalist terrorism.

"Iran's expression of support for the legitimate struggle of people against foreign occupation, and colonial or alien domination has been conveniently labelled by the U.S. as supporting terrorism," the document said. The press release also claimed that Iran was a victim, not a supporter, of terrorism.

Brian Moskowitz, a high school student at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute in North York made the five-hour bus trip to Ottawa to demonstrate his concern about the government's turning a blind eye towards Iran's alleged support of Islamic fundamentalist terrorist groups like Hamas.

"Even though it seems far away in Iran and Southwest Asia it can still affect you here, and people don't understand that," Moskowitz said.

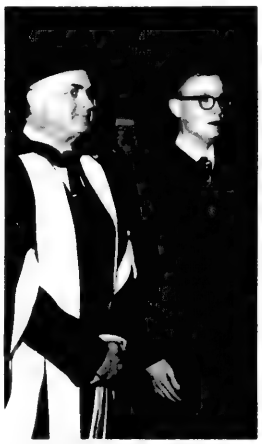
Shapiro named McGill's 15th principal

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For Montreal Jews who remember when Jewish enrolment at McGill University was strictly limited, the installation of Bernard Shapiro as principal and vice-chancellor was an event they thought they'd never see.

Montreal-born Shapiro, 60, a former deputy minister of education in Ontario, became McGill's 15th principal, in a ceremony that included a procession of colorfully robed representatives from over 50 North American universities (including Shapiro's identical twin Harold, president of Princeton University), a full orchestra and much pomp, before an audience of 3,000 at Place des Arts.



Gov. Gen. Ray Hnatyshyn (left) with Bernard Shapiro.

Governor-General Ray Hnatyshyn gave the university's charter and seal into Shapiro's keeping, in the traditional rite of transfer of office. Shapiro succeeds David Johnston, who was principal for 15 years.

Shapiro exchanged his resplendent fuchsia robe for the more somber gold-trimmed black gown worn by the McGill hierarchy, with the assistance of chancellor Gretta Chambers and Richard Pound, chair of the board of governors.

The benediction was given by Rabbi Ira Grussgott of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

In the audience was Shapiro's mother Mary and many of the people he and his brother had grown up with in Montreal.

After graduation from McGill in 1956, Shapiro left Montreal for Harvard, where he earned a PhD in education. He subsequently held academic posts in Boston and Ontario. Most recently, he was a University of Toronto professor.

In his bilingual address, Shapiro made no reference to the historical significance of his appointment. But he did pledge to keep McGill an "inviting and congenial" place for francophone students, and to encourage students to become proficient in both official languages.

"We cannot and should not choose to focus solely on the education of those who decide to live elsewhere. The experience of being at McGill — in whatever capacity — must be such as to either reinforce the fabulous diversity of Montreal and Quebec and the delight of direct participation in those cultural communities, or else construct within the imagination of those of our students who may eventually live elsewhere the value and distinctiveness of the life that flourishes here in Montreal and Quebec."

He warned against engaging in nostalgia for too long. "Our history can serve as a wellspring of lessons learned, and disappointments replaced by new beginnings, as we have struggled to understand and respond to the nature and purpose of our contribution to society."

In his speech entitled The Courage to Choose, Shapiro said universities need to find ways of maintaining excellence with diminishing resources "in the complex economic, social and political climate of Canada, Quebec and Montreal."

McGill cannot be "simply a community of scholars," he said. It must be "a community of scholarship" in which many different people inside and outside are participants.

McGill will have to "reimagine, and in some cases, reinvent the entire design of the teaching and research services that define us as a university." That means greater cooperation between its own departments and with other universities and institutions, and dialogue with government, graduates and the private sector, he said.

"Over the next generation, the more permeable the boundary, the more likely that our university can successfully compete with these enterprises for the vital but limited social resources of classroom space, library and learning materials, laboratories and, above all, the most sophisticated knowledge workers that should comprise our faculty."

In an interview with the McGill Reporter, Shapiro said the university will have to raise tuition and do more private fundraising to make up for the shortfalls in government funding.

Shapiro said he believes being an "educated person" must mean more than getting a degree. "Their education should help them to find joy in something."

Ostrovsky book called betrayal

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A veteran Israeli journalist is standing by his call for the death of former Mossad agent Victor Ostrovsky, author of two tell-all books about the Israeli intelligence agency.

What Ostrovsky did "is an act of treachery and I don't think any country can live with traitors, most particularly a country that lived in constant danger until very recently," said Joseph Lapid, a columnist with the Israeli newspaper Ma'ariv. "[Ostrovsky] is using his knowledge to sell out Israel, to do harm to Israel."

Reached by telephone, Ostrovsky denied he was damaging the Jewish state, saying he was exposing the Mossad as a rogue organization that was taken over in 1982 in a virtual coup d'etat by an "extremely right wing" element.

And he blasted Lapid's comments, saying there are "lunatics" in the Jewish community who might try to carry them out and become "the man who killed Liberty Vallance."

Speaking in a telephone interview from his home in Tel Aviv, Lapid stood by the comments he made recently on the CTV morning show, Canada AM. At that time he said, "Israelis occasionally die for their country. And I don't think that anybody should make a living out of betraying it. Ostrovsky has no right to live, except if he's prepared to return to Israel and stand trial. The Mossad cannot kill him because we cannot endanger our relations with Canada. But I hope there will be a decent Jew in Canada who does it for us."

Lapid did not backtrack from those comments when he spoke to The CJN last week. "I deeply believe in the obligations of Jews towards their country. [Ostrovsky] is selling for hard cash Israeli state secrets."

Although he characterized Ostrovsky's most recent book, The Other Side of Deception, as "90 per cent invention," Lapid said the remaining 10 per cent is a betrayal of Israel.

Asked if the book is more of an embarassment to Israel than a danger to state secrets, Lapid said "the embarrassment is to Jews that a Jew should harm Israel.

Victor Ostrovsky

Ostrovsky denied he was trying to harm Israel or Mossad agents. "This is not a vendetta against people. No one died from my first book and no one will die from my second book."

Ostrovsky's first book, By Way of Deception, outlined his experiences as a Mossad trainee and case officer. The most recent book takes up the story in 1986, after he left the Mossad. Ostrovsky said he remained as a sort of subcontractor to a dissident element in the Mossad who opposed its right-wing leadership.

Among the more sensational claims made in the second book is that Mossad was involved in the assassination of an Israeli general who was slated to take over the intelligence agency. The Mossad leadership did not want an outsider in charge, Ostrovsky claimed.

Mossad was also involved in the assassination of a German politician who was about to blow the whistle on a secret program of arms sales to Iran in the mid-1980s, he asserted.

Lapid said he first confronted Ostrovsky about the book on the Israeli television panel show, Popolitica, where he is one of three regular panelists. At the time, he said he told the audience that Ostrovsky "has no right to live."

Lapid, the former general manager of the Israeli Broadcasting Corporation, said Ostrovsky and his publisher, HarperCollins are using his comments to promote the book.

Ostrovsky said he appeared on Canada AM expecting Lapid to "recant" his earlier statement. As to Lapid's claim that he is profiting by selling out Israel, Ostrovsky said authors write books expecting to be paid for them. And he asserted that the Mossad was doing more harm to Israel than he.

Ostrovsky also took aim at Jewish communal organizations, saying "the silence of the Jewish community sounds like they agree with [Lapid]."

Responding to Lapid's remarks, Canadian Jewish Congress issued a statement saying, "Understandably Ostrovsky's contemptible actions have created resentment among Jews the world over. However, even in these extreme circumstances, Lapid's comments are regrettable, to say the least."

"That language is as strong as need be, given the situation," said Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Congress.

Education, democracy called antidote to Hamas popularity

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An expert on the Hamas movement says that it could take years of education and international efforts to shift strong Palestinian popular support away from the group.

Only 50 or 60 people are believed to head the "military" terrorist wing of Hamas in the Gaza Strip, said Ronni Shaked, a former journalist for Israel's Yediot Achronot and the author of two books on terrorism and Hamas.

But up to 500,000 Palestinians — one third of the Gaza Strip's Palestinian population — support Hamas' "political" wing, which provides social, educational and medical services, he said.

The idea of closing it down with that level of support is both impractical and impossible, Shaked told an audience of 150 at the Beth Israel Beth Aaron Synagogue.

Shaked said Hamas' "political" wing is now distinct from its "military" side and more likely to lose popular support if more international efforts go towards education and encouraging democracy in the Gaza Strip.

It's also vital, he said, for the West to choke off the funding that goes towards financing Hamas terrorism.

If not, support for Islamic fundamentalism could take over the entire region and spread around the world, Shaked warned.

"It will be many, many years, slowly, slowly," Shaked said. "But education, and economic and social development will mean less Hamas."

PLO chairman Yasser Arafat also has to get his act together, he said, both in terms of cracking down on Hamas terror and bringing some order to the allocation of international funds coming into the Gaza Strip.

Shaked punched a hole in the myth that Iran is one of the primary sources for Hamas terrorism. Iran has contributed mostly to the "political wing," he said.

Each time Israel cracks down and appears to cut Hamas off at the knees through a series of arrests, Shaked said, the organization regroups from the United States, channelling new leadership and arms into the Gaza Strip.

Hamas even set up military training camps in Oklahoma, Kansas and Illinois and received donations from individual contributors in Montreal and Toronto, Shaked said.

Shaked said Hamas began after the start of the intifadah in 1987 as an Islamic fundamentalist movement carrying anti-Jewish slogans.

Only when Israel and the PLO got serious about the peace process did Hamas start an active terrorist campaign to sabotage it by striking out at soldiers, settlers and citizens, Shaked said.

It has been so successful because terrorist acts are committed by ideologues fully prepared to die for the cause.

Since Israel left Gaza in the hands of the Palestinians last May, 66 Jews have been killed, Shaked said, and he predicted another wave of Hamas terror in the next months.

Shaked, however, did not think sealing off Palestinians from Israel would do any long-term good, since it would only help to build more Hamas support within the Gaza strip, deprive 16,000 Palestinians of jobs and Israel of workers.

Shaked's appearance was sponsored by the synagogue, Canada-Israel Committee-Quebec, under the auspices of the consulate general of Israel.

Talks must continue despite terror: Rubin

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The spate of Arab terrorism that has convulsed Israel since its rapprochement with the PLO in September 1993 cannot be blamed on the peace process.

Gary Rubin, executive director of Americans for Peace Now, said that terrorism rocked Israel long before Israel's current negotiations with the Arabs.

Speaking at a dinner honoring Mel Shipman, the founder of Canadian Friends of Peace Now, Rubin warned that a suspension of talks by Israel with its Arab partners to protest terrorism would be a great mistake. It would encourage Hamas, the chief perpetrator of anti-Israel violence, and undermine the legitimacy of the PLO.

Gary Rubin

Rubin challenged the wisdom of Israel's recent decision to seal off the territories, thereby depriving Palestinian day laborers the right to enter Israel.

The order is bound to foster greater poverty and despair in the territories — conditions that enable Hamas to exist and grow, he said.

Rubin urged international donor nations to speed up the delivery of promised aid to the Palestinian autonomous areas in Gaza and the West Bank town of Jericho.

If the peace process fails to improve the lot of the ordinary Palestinian, Hamas will benefit.

And Rubin suggested that Palestinian frustration will also grow if planned elections are not held as soon as possible. The Palestinians hunger to express themselves politically.

Rubin said the Palestinian track in the peace process is of vital importance, since it unlocks and nurtures the other tracks.

But he warned that progress on the Palestinian front could be drastically slowed if Jewish settlers in the West Bank and Gaza are not removed.

The settlements, he declared, are incompatible with peace.

Settlers who wish to move back to Israel should be compensated by the Israeli government. By his estimation, the cost of relocating them would be $2.5 billion (US) — less than the army's expense in protecting them.

With regard to Jerusalem, Rubin said no policy positions or actions should be taken by Israel to affect its final status.

Jerusalem, he said, should be a truly united city, as well as Israel's capital. But the needs of its Palestinian residents should be taken into account. "We don't want Jerusalem to be another Hebron," he said in a reference to that strife-torn West Bank town.

Shipman, who recently stepped down as president of the local Peace Now chapter after 14 years, voiced pride that the organization had established "the legitimacy of open debate and discussion" in the Jewish community.

He expressed relief that Israel and its Arab neighbors had finally "got it right" in settling down to fruitful peace talks.

But he said he was troubled by the perception of some Israelis that Israel's peace agreement with Jordan relieves Israel of the obligation to continue negotiations with the PLO on Palestinian self-determination.

Dror Zeigerman, Israel's consul-general in Toronto, called on the PLO to crack down on Hamas terrorism so as to convince the Israeli public that it truly seeks peace.

Rashad Saleh, chair of Palestine House in Toronto, described the recent Hamas suicide bombing of a Tel Aviv bus as "a horrible crime. We condemn it."

Simon Rosenblum, co-chair of Canadian Friends of Peace Now, said that Gaza should not be "a safe haven" for Hamas.

A handful of demonstrators outside picketed the dinner in the Primrose Club. One of the protestors said he belonged to the Jewish Defence League, which vehemently opposes the current peace process.

Radicals rebuffed

Much to everyone's relief, voters roundly rejected the radical right in last month's federal election in Germany.

There had been fears that the Republicans, Germany's largest far-right party, might even win a seat or two in the Bundestag on the strength of its xenophobic platform. But this was not to be. When the ballots were counted, the Republicans were once again shut out, receiving only 1.9 percent of the vote, 0.2 percent less than in the 1990 election. The Republicans suffered a resounding nation-wide defeat, in both western and eastern Germany.

The party, led by former SS Waffen recruit Franz Schonhuber, seemed on a roll as the number of violent neo-Nazi incidents against foreigners, Turkish residents and Jews rose alarmingly in the past several years. Schonhuber secured a place in the European Parliament, while Republican representatives captured seats on the state and municipal levels in Berlin, Bremen, Schleswig-Holstein and Baden-Wurttemberg.

But Schonhuber's fortunes fell when the electorate rightly concluded that the Republicans were growing increasingly shrill and courting the German People's Party, which is to its right. Last June, Schonhuber lost his European Parliament seat, and in the Oct. 16 German election, he was unequivocably rebuffed by a public that is repelled and ashamed by neo-fascist violence.

Schonhuber has consistently maintained that he is not a neo-Nazi. And while this assertion is open to debate, it has been established beyond a doubt that he panders to a kind of German nationalism which offends most Germans, scares the daylights out of guest workers and tarnishes Germany's image abroad.

The German people acted wisely and resolutely in rejecting the Republicans. After disastrous flings with fascism and communism in this century, Germans are plainly weary and suspicious of ideologues flaunting simplistic solutions to their complex problems. Schonhuber and politicians of his ilk have yet to understand that Germany has had its fill of extremism.

Libya and loopholes

Most of the news emanating from the Middle East these days turns on the efforts by Israel and the PLO to secure a just and lasting peace — not an easy task with Hamas threatening mayhem on a regular basis.

Preoccupation with Hamas terrorists has obscured another serious breach of international morality involving Libya and cooperating countries, which has been going on for quite some time.

Because of Tripoli's refusal to hand over two intelligence agents suspected in the bombing of Pan Am's Flight 107 over Lockerbie, Scotland in December 1988, the United Nations (UN) Security Council passed Resolution 833, under which all of Libya's overseas assets were frozen.

This was the last in a series of economic embargoes taken initially by the United States and the UN to force Libya into complying with elementary legal standards of justice. It is supplementary to the cessation of international flights to Libya and other economic measures.

Now it has been learned that two firms in the Netherlands Antilles, Oilinvest International and Oilinvest Curacao, have been working with Libya to avoid the restrictions against that country's export of oil and other natural resources. The two firms in question have 33 subsidiary companies in Germany, Switzerland, Spain and Hungary which engage in oil refining activities.

The Middle East (Oct. 1994), a magazine published in London, reports that those subsidiaries "refine and market about 35,000 barrels a day of Libyan crude — over one-third of Tripoli's total output." By using second and third parties, the Libyan government has effectively executed an end-run against the embargoes ordered by the UN and the United States.

The American government is moving, somewhat ponderously, to plug the loopholes the Libyans have cunningly exploited. The government cannot, however, move fast enough. Libya still remains, under its current leadership, a terrorist state which cannot be permitted to run amok in the international community.

A SHARP-EYED READER

As a loyal reader of Sheldon Kirshner's column, I wish to convey my thanks and appreciation of his writing. I also wish to draw attention to a certain discrepancy in his Oct. 13 article: "Hitler's birthplace reflects infamous past."

In column 3 is the following quote: "Salzburg, the birthplace of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, is approximately 60 kilometres north of Braunau." In column 1, on the small map, Salzburg is south of Braunau.

Harvey H. Herstein

Sheldon Kirshner replies: You're absolutely right. Braunau in fact is north of Salzburg.

NEWS FROM THE MIDBAR

Here's some news that may stun some of your readers — there is actually a considerable area of Canada outside the borders of Toronto and Montreal!

There are Conservative Jews living out there in that midbar, and they don't seem to suffer from the same femiphobia as the Torontonians and Montrealers do.

I dare to make public this dangerous revisionism because, once again, I read of Ontario Camp Ramah's tiresome head-in-the-sand attitude towards female rabbis and cantors (CJN, Oct. 13).

Leaving aside the wholly distasteful matter of censorship (does Rabbi Mitchell Cohen really think his campers have never heard, nor should hear, of female rabbis?), who says the rest of Canadian Conservative Jewry thinks that way? If the way they conduct religious services is any indicator, they most certainly do not.

The overwhelming majority of Conservative congregations outside of Toronto and Montreal are egalitarian in their practice, including counting both women and men in the minyan. West of the Ontario-Manitoba border, only one out of nine congregations does not offer aliyot to women.

Here in Vancouver, of approximately 1,300 member families in Conservative congregations, 1,250 belong to synagogues which are fully egalitarian. And I've never heard of one Conservative rabbi or cantor outside Ontario and Quebec threatening to quit the rabbinical or cantors' assemblies over the issue of female rabbis and cantors.

So if the central Canadian Conservative establishment can hear through all that sand, I say to them: (a) you don't speak for all Canadians; and (b) if you continue to censor free and rational discussion, especially among our youth, you'll censor them right out of the movement, if not Judaism altogether.

THE FUR INDUSTRY

Rachel Alkallay's article, Natural Furs: Fun, Elegant (CJN Fall Fashion Supplement, Sept. 14) is misleading and deceptive. A "return of fur to women's wardrobes" is announced. Alkallay offers the explanation that the fur industry is "fickle" and "cyclical in nature" but that the cycle is now favorable to the industry.

It may well be that fur's popularity has waxed and waned, but the trend in fur sales over the past decade is definitely down.

Buyers should also beware of one furrier's claim that a "rich brown mink will always be in style." When high-profile designers like Calvin Klein have announced they will no longer produce fur garments, how can anyone make such a guarantee?

While individual concepts of what is fun may vary, there can be no doubt that the many unfortunate creatures who were caught in leghold traps or lived out brief lives in tiny cages and were killed by electrocution did not have fun.

AU SUJET DE LA CSQ

Concernant l'article de M. Elias Levy intitulé "La CSQ sévèrement critiquée" (publié dans l'édition du CJN du 27 octobre dernier), je tiens à souligner le fait que M. Gabay n'a en aucune façon répondu aux allégations soulevées par M. Jules Cohen et tout ce que le président de la CSQ a pu nous apprendre c'est comment manquer de respect à un membre élu en prétendant que ce membre qui travaille très très fort dans ce Conseil ne comprend rien au rouage organisationnel de la CSQ.

Tout ce que M. Gabay n'a pas dit c'est que toutes les restrictions contenues dans les statuts de la CSQ visent uniquement à freiner toute infiltration des membres du Rabbinat au sein de la CSQ.

M. Gabay ferait bien par commencer à respecter ses propres membres du Conseil avant que les membres de sa Communauté ne commencent à avoir la moindre considération à son égard puisque lui-même n'est pas élu par les membres de la communauté "at large".

DESERT ACCORD

A time of reflection after peace with Jordan

The show I witnessed in Eyn-Evrona was well-staged and impressive. In the former no man's land between the cities of Eilat and Aqaba, 5,000 assembled guests filled the hastily improvised one-day stadium. The heat was dry and bearable, its 35 degrees softened by the dependable breeze that blows from the Red Sea through the narrow valley and northward over the lunar landscape of the southern Negev.

For the first time in history a mixed audience of Israelis and Jordanians was expected to fraternize. But while the peace agreement was signed ceremoniously by the leaders on the platform, the onlookers in the stadium did not really mix.

In the north, at the same time, a few Katyusha rockets were delivering a different message to Northern Galilee.

Shortly after all the handshakes, President Bill Clinton flew to Damascus to see Hafez al-Assad. At their press conference, the Syrian president was stiff and awkward; in response, the president was visibly uncomfortable. Later in Jerusalem, he tried to correct the impression of total failure registered by both the Israeli audience and his domestic critics. Up to a point he was right. To have ignored Assad altogether on this tour would have made bad politics. U.S.-Syrian contacts should go on.

PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat was not invited to the peace celebration. He was left to ruminate over its impact on the Palestinian cause. As Amman and Jerusalem were savoring their treaty, Gaza and the West Bank remained closed after the Hamas carnage in Tel Aviv, depriving 80,000 Arab breadwinners of their daily income from Israel, for which Arafat has so far no substitute. A few days later, he met Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres in Casablanca to protest against this collective punishment and obtained some relief.

By Yeshayahu Nunes

In that Moroccan city, senior cabinet ministers and other official representatives of 60 nations and over a thousand businessmen from all over the world met in an extraordinary economic gathering. The declared aim was to see how the ongoing peace process in the Middle East could be assisted by imaginative projects of regional development, to be promoted by government and private business initiatives backed by international banking.

While no spectacular results could be expected to materialize during the conference itself, the prominent participation of Arab Gulf states, as well as King Hassan's lavish hospitality, confirmed the impression, that a major psychological breakthrough had indeed taken place in the Arab-Israeli relationship during the last year.

No longer isolated in a region hitherto characterized by conflict and boycott, Israel now appeared to be the most active broker of a new era of peace and prosperity. This prominence — Israel has sent eight ministers, 10 MPs and the largest delegation to the conference — itself a brain-child of Shimon Peres — was a bit too ostentatious. It enabled Arab opponents of the peace process, but also some others, to suspect Israel of "economic imperialism."

There is no doubt that tangible economic growth, most particularly in the territories and in Arab countries surrounding Israel, could be the most effective guarantor of lasting peace between the peoples of the region, more than the most perfected peace agreements between governments. It was, therefore, a very good idea to let economy have its say at this stage of the peace process.

A senior European representative at the conference, using diplomatic language, put his finger on the real issue when he expressed the hope that ordinary people will start to benefit from the peace talks. "If we can achieve this," he said, "the peoples of the Middle East will lead their governments to the next phases of the peace process.

Nicely put, for in the Arab camp as well as in Israel, only popular support will enable governments to take their next steps on this road to historical peace. Without it, the process will be derailed and no economic utopia will bring any much needed foreign investment to the area.

Meanwhile, massive popular support is nowhere to be seen. It is missing in the squalid reality of Gaza and the West Bank, where the well-financed Hamas is prospering at the expense of the penniless PLO. Support is also insecure in Jordan where the Palestinian majority feels let down by the king after his separate peace treaty with Israel.

And even in Israel, any progress in the further implementation of the agreement with Arafat over the West Bank, or any possible accord with Assad over the Golan, will require much more popular support than is currently available. In both cases territorial concessions will mean inevitable dislocation of Jewish settlers from those areas and present huge political difficulties.

So, in the aftermath of the treaty with Jordan, and after the conference in Casablanca, this is a moment for stocktaking and for reflection. Although experience has shown that the peace process can be advanced by bold initiatives in single sectors, it has also shown that progress on one front activates other sectors that were apparently left stranded in limbo.

Since a viable peace can only be regional or not be at all, the Israeli government will soon have to decide where to look next for progress. The chances are that the unreported contacts with Syria will continue with American assistance, while more emphasis will now have to be devoted to the Israeli-PLO relationship, which is in very urgent need of repair. After all, this relationship is not only the most accident-prone; it is also to be the pivotal pillar on which the whole peace construction is to stand.

Arafat's moment of truth has dawned

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Yasser Arafat, the beleaguered chairman of the PLO, has reached a crossroad.

The bombing of a bus in central Tel Aviv last month, the climax of a series of sickening terrorist acts perpetrated by Hamas in the past year, has increased the pressure on Arafat to clamp down on terrorism.

Arafat is feeling the heat because Hamas maintains training camps and arsenals of weapons in the Gaza Strip, one of two Palestinian autonomous areas he has controlled since Israel and the PLO signed a formal peace agreement in Cairo last May.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has warned Arafat that the peace process might well grind to a halt unless he reins in the forces of Palestinian rejectionism. As he put it: "Whoever wants to advance peace must fight the radical, murderous terrorists of Hamas... because they are the murderers of peace."

The next crucial phases of Israel's accord with the PLO call for an Israeli army redeployment on the West Bank and for Palestinian elections in the territories.

But Rabin has warned Arafat that there will be no further withdrawals, and hence no progress in the march toward Palestinian self-rule, unless he demonstrates a serious willingness to try to control Hamas and deadly offshoots like Islamic Jihad.

It comes down to this: Peace without security is a dubious enterprise. If Israeli streets run red with the blood of victims of Arab terrorism, Israelis may lose heart and withdraw their backing of the peace process with the Palestinians. It is a chilling prospect that Rabin and Arafat dread and hope to avoid at all costs. The Palestinian question remains at the heart of the Arab-Israeli conflict, and if it proves insoluble, the possibility for a comprehensive settlement may well fade.

To be sure, Israel does not really expect Arafat and his fledgling, ill-trained police force to wipe out Hamas, whose prestige, particularly in Gaza, has grown since the outbreak of the intifadah in December 1987. It hasn't been forgotten that Israel, with all its superior resources, was unable to crush Hamas. So there is a realization in Jerusalem that Arafat's ability to deal with Hamas is fairly limited. At best, he can probably do no more than contain Hamas.

Until now, though, Arafat has not been resolute enough. He has condemned terrorism, but sometimes belatedly. He has rounded up terrorist suspects, but almost immediately released them. In short, he has held back, giving Israelis the uneasy impression of a bloodless if not complicit bystander.

And this is not mere conjecture. As the commander of the Palestinian police, Gen. Nasr Yousef, said recently: "We have the capability to act against the terrorists, but we have not received an order from the political level to do so."

What is lacking is political will on Arafat's part. Caught between Hamas and Israel, Arafat finds himself on the horns of a dilemma.

If he launches a concerted campaign against Hamas and its allies, he may not only be attacked as a collaborator and traitor, but may actually trigger a destructive Palestinian civil war.

Full-scale violence in the autonomous Palestinian areas, right on Israel's doorstep, would have disastrous consequences. It would seriously endanger Israel's peace process with the PLO and thus strengthen radical groups like Hamas which oppose peace and Israel's very existence.

It would also indefinitely delay the transfer of some $2 billion worth of promised development aid to Gaza and the West Bank town of Jericho. Without such funds, the economic dividends that peace was expected to bring to the impoverished inhabitants of Gaza would simply vanish. International donors will not pour money into Gaza and Jericho if peace and stability do not prevail.

Until last month's bloody events, Arafat resisted Israeli demands to confront and disarm Hamas, hoping to co-opt their leaders. He had his reasons. He did not forge an historic rapprochment with Israel to create further divisions in the already fractured Palestinian community. And he still wants to be remembered as the father of Palestinian self-determination and, if it is possible, statehood.

But Hamas, backed by Palestinian militants and countries like Iran and Libya, has not cooperated, pushing Arafat against a hard rock. Hamas' recalcitrance is not surprising, for it adamantly rejects the PLO's conception of peace. Hamas yearns for an Islamic state in Palestine, built on the rubble of Israel.

Clearly, the PLO faces painful choices. Yet it can no longer afford to sit on the fence, antagonizing Israel and implicitly bolstering Hamas. The time has come for the PLO to take sides. For Arafat, the moment of truth has finally dawned. He cannot forestall the inevitable.

Discovering new things about my mother

It's a strange thing. You think you know someone — and especially someone as close as your parent — and then you find out there's still more to learn.

My mother has now been gone for a year and a half, and we are still sorting out things she left behind. The other day my wife came across a little book of recipes which over the years she had copied from one source or another. We were about to discard it when a number of clippings and scraps of paper fell out. No recipes these, rather, but clippings from newspapers and scribbled notes of things she had read or heard.

Many of my readers will remember that my mother, who did not have much of a formal education, decided to go to university at 88 and received her honorary BA at the University of Toronto at 100. When she died, she was almost 103.

What these clippings confirmed once again was that Mother constantly struggled to improve herself not only on the intellectual level (which she never ceased to do until the day she died) but on the human level of emotion and self-perception.

Some of the scraps of paper that fell out of the recipe book may have been jotted on 50 years ago. They do not reveal who the author was or from where she copied it. It was meant entirely for herself, to remind herself of who and what she wanted to be. So, in recopying a few of them, I bring you not high-fallutin' philosophy but rather the yearning of one woman's heart.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

A little folded piece of paper, with watercolor pictures of two birds.

Said the robin to the sparrow:
"I should really like to know
Why these anxious human beings
Rush about and worry so."
Said the sparrow to the robin:
"I think that it must be
That they have no Heavenly Father
Such as cares for you and me."

(Mother was pious; she constantly read her prayer book.)

A scrap of paper dated August 1976:

"Life is an orchestra. Blow your horn but always be part of the other players. Do it while you play and while you rest — even if you never get a solo part."

Mother had lived in Brighton-Hove in southern England during World War II. I think she never quite lost some of her Old Country wonder about North American ways. She cut this from a newspaper, a letter that was signed, "Lassie from Lancastershire":

"There's no place in all the world where laziness and creature comforts are so expensively encouraged. For example: you people can't cut roasts without an electric knife, you can't wash a few dishes without an electric dishwasher, you must use a blender to whip cream, mix cake or prepare omelettes. You buy frozen foods which must be kept in the freezer because you are too busy (lazy) to go to the market and purchase fresh food, which is much cheaper, more healthful and tastes better.

"The wastefulness I have seen in the U.S. is a scandal. The meals served in restaurants are double what they should be. The food thrown out by families (leftovers) is a disgrace. Almost everyone is overweight and trying to diet. It doesn't add up."

The following may have been the first clipping she put into her recipe book:

"Take two heaping cups of patience, one partful of love, two handfuls of generosity, add a dash of laughter and a full cup of understanding, and two cups of loyalty. Mix well and sprinkle generously with kindness and spread this irresistible delicacy over a lifetime and serve everybody you meet."

Cooking — a family tradition

In this age of gender equality, a distinct division of labor still exists in exercising domestic responsibilities. Cooking is woman's work, but barbecuing is man's work.

Such is the case in our household, except I also cook on special occasions and Chanukah is one such occasion.

By Jack Chisvin

Making potato latkes is my forte. While my son was still living at home he was my sous chef and we would play squash to decide who got the dubious honor of mincing the onions. Now his son, my grandson, is being trained in the art of latke making — starting with the basics, peeling the potatoes.

When a national radio talk show invited contestants to write about Chanukah and potato latkes, my wife described our family tradition. Whether it was her convincing prose, the generational thing (Jewish continuity?) or my superb latke recipe that turned on the judges, she won a prize — a cook book.

Shortly after arriving in Toronto from Winnipeg, my friend Bob Hall and I shared an apartment. We were the original odd couple. You can imagine which one of us was Felix and which one Oscar. It was during this time that I discovered the truism in the Talmudic admonition that "food must not be treated disrespectfully." For me cooking became a survival skill — it was that or leave the kitchen to Bob and suffer the consequences.

My behavior in the kitchen has been greatly influenced by my mother. She was a gifted cook. She never owned a cookbook or a recipe box — she cooked instinctively. She came from the shis and mish school of cooking.

When asked how much of an ingredient she used, her answer was "enough, but not too much;" when asked what consistency a mix should be she said, "not too thick, but not too thin either;" how long should it remain in the oven — "until it is done, but not too long." To her cooking was a creative art, not following formulaic recipes.

She also had the most extraordinary names for her creations. For instance, hot spicy meatballs were called kalte kugelach (cold dumpling) and puffy cinnamon buns were called pletzels (flat bread). When questioned why she called them by such contrary names, she answered with perfect logic "Because that's what my mother called them."

Another special occasion on which I cook is in celebration of a bountiful harvest. As an urban farmer I tend a 40-sq. m vegetable plot which a few years ago was a dry clay bed and now yields a cornucopia of produce. The first harvest of salad greens was at the beginning of May, the last tomatoes were picked at the end of October and the root crops are still being dug up.

Several years ago, prompted by an abundance of vegetables, I was inspired to concoct a potage which I now serve regularly as a hearty harvest meal.

Had this been my mother's potage recipe, she might have described it like this:

Lightly stirfry enough julienned carrots, parsnips and Jerusalem artichokes. In a large stock pot saute several diced leeks and red onions using virgin olive oil. Add the stir fried vegetables and some good dry red wine poured from a full bottle. Cook gently, stirring constantly with a wooden spoon. Turn heat down, but not off.

Cut up a chunk of partly cooked pickled brisket into bite-sized pieces and throw into the pot to give it a Yiddish tam. Add a few leaves of shredded red cabbage, a handful of chopped mushrooms, a garlic clove and a bay leaf. Fill the pot with cold water. Turn heat up and bring to a boil, stir, turn down heat, cover pot and simmer for an hour, more or less.

While the pot is simmering, slowly sip the remainder of the wine. Between sips blanch some noodles. After a while add the noodles to the pot, which should be quite full by now. Simmer for another few minutes. Pour into large bowls, top with a generous amount of grated peppercorns and serve with a hunk of fresh pumpernickel bread accompanied by another bottle of dry red wine.

Since I doubt my mother ever sipped wine, I added that step to make the joy of cooking even more joyous.

To complete the story, the national radio program which awarded my wife a prize held another contest soliciting original recipes.

After assuring myself that it was an equal opportunity contest, I submitted my recipe. I heard nothing until one day a cousin in Winnipeg phoned to tell me that she heard on the radio about a great potage recipe originated by an amateur gourmet chef — Jack Chisvin. How about that — a gourmet chef! My mother would have been proud.

Pact with Jordan fulfils Israel's Zionist dream

By DROR ZEIGERMAN

King Hussein and Prime Minister Rabin signed an historic agreement in the Arava. For us, the generation born during the fight for Independence, it fulfils the Zionist dream — to live in peace and harmony with our Arab neighbors.

Unfortunately, the meeting between King Abdullah and Golda Meir in 1947, which was supposed to have been part of this dream, ended it with the assassination of the King. Their successors, Yitzhak Rabin and King Hussein, have tried to correct this historical tragedy.

For we Israelis there was a dream. We dreamt it when we drove along the Jordan River from the Sea of Galilee to Eilat; when we served in the IDF along the border, looked east, and dreamt of crossing the Jordan River; when we watched the Moab mountains and dreamt of visiting Amman, Petra and Jaresh, the famous historical cities which we know about from reading the Torah. Now we can do it!

There is great hope and understanding in Israel that this peace will be a comprehensive and full peace.

King Hussein and Prime Minister Rabin used the term "peace with dignity." It is the first time that we are signing a peace agreement where we give peace and get peace in return, without the necessity of giving up land or uprooting settlements. Even though we have made some corrections in the borders, the Jordanians were flexible and generous to lease back the land so that Israeli settlers could continue to cultivate it.

This is the reason that there is a consensus in Israel and great hope and joy for the future.

We still realize that in order to complete a comprehensive peace we must continue the process with the Palestinians and Syria. In both cases, Israel is ready to compromise and the government declared that they are willing to give back territory for peace. But because we have to compromise and because we have to pay a high price for peace, the Palestinians and the Syrians must prove to us that they are ready to live with us in peace, stop the support of terrorist organizations, open borders and create economic and diplomatic relations.

In the case of the Palestinians, they must prove that they represent the Palestinian people. The tragic events that occurred in Nahlat Shiva in Jerusalem, on Dizengoff Street in Tel-Aviv, and the murder of Nachshon Waxman and Nir Poraz do not encourage the confidence of the people of Israel that Yasser Arafat is in control. The PLO must understand that without condemning and fighting the radical terrorist organization, Hamas, it will be very difficult to convince the Israeli people to support the peace process.

Let us hope that the agreement with Jordan will encourage Syria and the Palestinians to conclude the peace process and learn from Jordan, that when peace is in the interest of both sides, both sides must compromise.

Dror Zeigerman is the consul general of Israel for Toronto.

Raids weaken neo-Nazis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

On Dec. 6, 1993, the popular mayor of Vienna, Helmut Zilk, was at home examining his mail. As he opened one letter, an explosion shook the room, wounding him.

Across town, similar letter bombs injured a Roman Catholic priest, a TV journalist and a secretary.

The victims were known for supporting the rights of immigrants, refugees and minorities. Outraged by the bombings, Austrian Chancellor Franz Vranitzky declared, "This subjects our whole country to a test which we must pass. It must be possible for a state... like Austria to put a stop to this."

Within days of his statement, four suspects were rounded up. Not surprisingly, they were neo-Nazis. Subsequently, two were released for lack of evidence. The other two were charged, and their trial is expected to begin shortly.

The spate of letter bombs sent a shudder of fear down the spine of Austria, a nation whose Nazi past is still a topic of anguished debate. And while the letter bombing campaign was the most serious crime in memory committed by Austrian neo-Nazis, it was hardly an existential threat to Austria as a democratic state.

For the fact of the matter is that neo-Nazis, their violent tendencies notwithstanding, are a minuscule minority in this country, a blip on the screen.

By all accounts, there are 40 extreme right-wing organizations and groups here, with a combined membership of several hundred. The Vienna-based Documentation Centre for the Austrian Resistance Movement, which monitors their activities, claims they have been weakened by a series of police raids and arrests.

Several of their most important leaders are either in prison or in exile, according to Wilhelm Lasek, a researcher at the centre.

Bomb injured Vienna mayor

The neo-Nazis serving time are Gottfried Kussel, Walter Ochensberger and Gunther Reinthaler, all of whom were convicted of denying the Holocaust and calling for the restoration of the Nazi party.

Austrian law prohibits open neo-Nazi activity and public advocacy of Nazi objectives.

Gerd Honsik, the first neo-Nazi to have been convicted of Holocaust denial, fled Austria and is apparently in hiding in Spain.

Ernst Gehmacher — a political scientist at the Institute of Empirical and Social Research — believes that neo-Nazis have become bolder since the 1986 Kurt Waldheim affair. It was touched off when Profil magazine and the World Jewish Congress accused the former United Nations secretary-general of concealing his role as a Wehrmacht officer in the Balkans.

Nevertheless, Gehmacher adds, Austrian neo-Nazis are strictly a marginal group, consisting of "aggressive gangs playing out their aggression." And proportionately speaking, there are fewer of them in Austria than in Germany.

Their chief targets are foreigners, non-European residents and asylum-seekers. But on occasion, they seek out their oldest target, Jews — spray-painting anti-Semitic slogans on walls and daubing swastikas on headstones in Jewish cemeteries.

As a rule, they do not try to kill Jews. The gravest anti-Semitic incident in Austria since World War II — the murder of three Jews in a Vienna synagogue in 1981 — was carried out by Palestinian radicals ineradicably opposed to Israel's existence.

So as concerned as they are about the phenomenon of neo-Nazis, Jewish leaders here do not overstate the case.

Helmut Zilk

"Neo-Nazis are not yet a threat to Jews," says Avshalom Hodik, executive director of the Israelitschen Kultusgemeinde, the umberella body of Austrian Jewry.

"Neo-Nazis exist everywhere," observes Paul Eisenberg, the chief rabbi of Austria. "They don't endanger democracy in Austria."

However, Paul Grosz, president of the community, charges that prison sentences for neo-Nazis are not severe enough and that existing laws designed to contain them are insufficiently enforced.

Two years ago, the federal government passed new legislation lightening jail sentences meted out to persons advocating Nazi ideas. Juries had repeatedly acquitted defendants rather than sending them to jail for excessive periods of time. The new law, the reasoning went, would make it easier to prosecute neo-Nazis.

It remains to be seen whether this legislation will be effective. But in the meantime, most Austrians who abhor anti-Semitism and xenophobia are far more worried about a right-wing charismatic politician named Jorg Haider, leader of the Austrian Freedom Party (FPO), who brought international opprobrium upon himself by praising Hitler's labor policies.

Haider, who has been compared to France's Jean-Marie Le Pen and Germany's Franz Schonhuber, maintains that the FPO is a constitutional party. Until last month, the FPO had 33 parliamentary seats, compared to 80 for the Socialist party, 60 for the People's party and 10 for the Greens. But in October's general election, the FPO won 42 seats, while the Socialists and the People's party lost ground. In the 1991 municipal elections in Vienna, the FPO emerged as the second-strongest party after the Socialists.

Haider denies accusations that he is an extremist, but critics claim that the FPO's anti-immigrant rhetoric inflames existing prejudices against foreigners. And while Haider himself has never publicly expressed anti-Semitic sentiments or ideas, Jews feel somewhat intimidated by him.

"His xenophobia impacts on Jews," says Hodik. And Grosz is of the view that he "caters to anti-Semites."

Whether such opinions are true or not, Haider has forced the government to pass restrictive immigration and asylum laws, comments Richard Mitten, director of the Centre for International and Interdisciplinary Studies at the University of Vienna.

This legislation, contained in the 1992 Asylum Act and the 1993 Residence Act, is fiercely opposed by an organization called SOS-Mitmensch (SOS-Fellow Human Beings).

Calling itself "a kind of public relations company for tolerance," SOS-Mitmensch believes that the estimated 600,000 foreigners in Austria are a lightning rod for popular discontent.

Since its formation in 1992, it has sponsored candle-lit processions against racism, xenophobia and anti-Semitism, and organized school discussions on these topics.

Two of its spokesmen, Nikolaus Kunrath and Martin Schenk, disclosed that many of the hostile letters they receive are rife with anti-Semitism.

* * *

Public opinion polls taken in Austria suggest that about a quarter of the population is negatively disposed toward Jews.

Austria has a long anti-Semitic tradition, notes Grosz. Karl Lueger (1844-1910), the former mayor of Vienna, was a tireless reformer as well as an ardent anti-Semite. He exerted a profound influence on Hitler, a fellow Austrian. A main thoroughfare in Vienna is named after Lueger, and a statue of Lueger stands opposite Vienna's biggest park.

It is hardly surprising, then, that 10 to 15 per cent of Austrians are hardcore anti-Semites, according to Gehmacher. (Upwards of 20 per cent are philo-Semitic.)

Austrian youth less anti-Semitic

A 1992 survey taken by the American Jewish Committee (AJC) found that younger and better educated Austrians tended to be less anti-Semitic.

Anti-Semitism once had a strong base in the Roman Catholic Church, but this theological-grounded animus appears to be on the wane.

A case in point is the Rinn blood libel, which has its origins in the Middle Ages.

For centuries, the inhabitants of Rinn, a town near Innsbruck, worshiped the bones of a boy who was supposedly tortured and murdered by Jews during a sacrificial ceremony.

Last summer, Bishop Reinhold Stecher banned the Rinn cult, saying it was wrong and untenable in this day and age.

Mideast Analysis
By Sheldon Kirshner

Truth is not an absolute concept, particularly in the Middle East. This occurred to me after trying to digest Farouk al-Shaara's unsubstantiated claim that Syria had never shelled Israeli civilians before the 1967 Six Day War. Shaara, Syria's foreign minister, delivered this bombshell in his first interview on Israeli television last month.

He was telling less than the truth. Yet I would hesitate to accuse him of deliberately lying, since he was probably sincere.

This is at the nub of a recurring problem which bedevils the Middle East — the chronic tendency of its elites to embroider events to suit their ulterior purposes.

I should not have been surprised by Shaara's Alice-in-Wonderland meanderings. Twenty years ago, when I visited Syria, I quickly learned that one person's compelling truth is another person's unspeakable blasphemy.

On the road back to Damascus from a visit to Kuneitra, the ruined garrison town which Israel returned to Syria in 1974 by agreement, my Syrian guide and I conversed.

Syrian tales

I have forgotten much of what was said on that hot, dusty drive. But I have not forgotten my guide's vehement denial that Israel was attacked by Arab armies, including Syria's, after it proclaimed statehood in May 1948. When he finished, I expressed disbelief. Even Arab historians, I noted, did not dispute this basic fact.

In May 1948, a column of Syrian tanks and armored vehicles attacked a cluster of Jewish settlements in the Galilee. Syria's broad objective, if not to extinguish Israel's very existence, was to capture and hold territory France had claimed when it was the mandatory power in Syria. These areas embraced the protruding finger of northeastern Galilee and the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee.

The armistice accord that was supposed to end Israel's military conflict with Syria required the Syrians to withdraw their forces from these redoubts and required Israel to keep its army out of three demilitarized zones (DMZs) along their common frontier. The sovereignty of the DMZs was to be decided at a later date.

A clause in Israel's July 1949 accord with Syria, however, recognized "the gradual restoration of normal civilian life in the area of the demilitarized zone" as a fundamental aim of the ceasefire pact. Syria rejected this interpretation, thereby sowing the seeds of confrontation.

Further tension was exacerbated by Israeli farming activities and irrigation projects in the DMZs, Israel's removal of Arab farmers living there, and a dispute over fishing rights in the Sea of Galilee.

Since, in their view, Israel had encroached on the DMZs, the Syrians fired on Israeli civilians from bunkers on the Golan Heights. Israel retaliated, touching off a series of tit-for-tat battles.

So to recap — Syrian gunners did pound Israeli civilians. Syria can argue that it terrorized Israelis to claim title to what it considered Syrian land. But to say, as Shaara did before an incredulous Israeli TV audience, that Syria never fired on Israel is patently false and a complete misreading of history.

Rabbinical Reflections

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

In this week's sedrah we read how our forefather Yaakov "slept in that place" (Bereshit 28:11).

Comments Rabbi Yehuda in the Midrash, "here he slept but for the 14 years that he learned Torah in the yeshivah of Shem and Ever, he did not sleep."

Yaakov Avinu taught us, and the Torah eternally teaches us, that to prepare for the trials and tribulations of life, one needs a good schooling in Torah study.

I was privileged to spend 13 years in the Telshe Yeshivah and the Ner Israel Yeshivah, but I must confess I slept during those years. Halevai that I had used those years more diligently and slept less!

Torah study is a life-long mandate. Maimonides (Laws of Talmud Torah, chapter 1:10) states, "Until when is one obligated to learn Torah? Until the day of his death as it says, 'Lest you remove these words from your heart, all the days of your life?' "

The Mishnah states, "These are the mitzvot that have no limit . . . and the study of Torah equals them all." (Peah 1:1). The Talmud informs us that after 120 years when man is brought before the Heavenly Tribunal, the second question asked is "Did you set aside regular time to study Torah?" (Shabbos 31a).

The Jew's life is governed in every step he takes by the Torah, the Talmud, and the Shulchan Aruch (code of Jewish Law). It was Rabbi Yisrael Salanter who asked "how can a Jew walk four cubits without knowing Shas (the entire Talmud) by heart?"

We are known as the People of the Book. I wonder sometimes to which book many of our people think that statement is referring. We read all kinds of books these days. But och un vei what some of those books teach us.

The "book" referred to is the Torah and extended commentaries including the Talmud and Shulchan Aruch. Thank G-d there has been a resurgence of Jewish learning all over the world. I'm not just referring to Jewish elementary, secondary, yeshivot and Kollelim education. There is the Daf HaYomi (daily Talmudic page) program proposed by Rabbi Meir Shapiro, the Lubliner Rav. The cycle began in 1924, and in 1990 the ninth cycle was completed.

There are approximately 20 Daf HaYomi groups in Toronto. If you cannot physically attend a learning group, you can join the Dial-a-Daf program. For a one time registration fee of $36, and a monthly fee of $15, you can dial up and hear the daily talmudic lesson. These are prerecorded by expert talmudists all over the world. In Toronto contact Rabbi Heshy Nussbaum at (416) 783-4374 to register. He will tell you how to order a complete Talmud cassette tape set.

We sleep approximately eight hours a day. That's a third of our lives. If we rob a little time from sleep, over the years we can enrich ourselves with a lot of Torah study. We can habituate ourselves to almost anything — even to rising an hour early, or reprioritizing the day so that we can put together 60 minutes for study. Happy stealing!

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

KOHEN — KATZ

The descendants of the Kohen Gadol, the high priest Aaron, brother of Moses, regarded their heredity as prestigious and naturally adopted it as their surname.

There are numerous variations: Kogan, Kagan, Kahn, Kan, Kaganov, Kaganovich, Kagansky, Kaganovsky, Kaplan (chaplain), and Kaplansky.

It is also the origin of the surname Katz — an acronym for Kohen Tzadek — priest of righteousness.

The Villas of 760 please meticulous buyers

Today, when making a major purchase such as a home, people choose with an eye to quality and the long term. The Villas of 760 are designed and built to meet the requirements of even the most meticulous buyer. Solid construction, easy maintenance, and the safety, comfort and decorative tastes of the home owner have all been treated as essentials.

There are three models, the Monte Carlo, the Monaco and the Cannes. All are solidly built of clay brick. Soldier coursing, brick arches and keystones give the Villas elegant, dignified exteriors which harmonize with the permanence and solidity of their construction.

Other exterior features include pre-finished maintenance-free aluminum soffit, fascia, eavestrough and downspouts. Every house also has a balcony in front, and an external connection for a gas barbecue.

The front door is fitted with a brass grip set, house number, coach lamp, door bell with electric chime, and deadbolt lock. In addition, it has a rough-in for a security system. There are casement or fixed thermal windows in front, and a pre-cast concrete slab and paved walkway to the entrance.

Every Villa has its own private garage and paved driveway in front. In all models, there is a tap in the garage. The basements, located at street level next the garage, have poured concrete walls; there is a powder room and storage area in each basement, as well as an inside stairway to the main floor.

The elegance and solidity of the exterior is matched within the house. The interior trim features brass finish hardware. There are Series 800 doors in finished areas, and Colonial baseboards with quarter-round in all tiled areas. All the main floor archways are trimmed. For floor areas, the vendor offers a selection of quality 35-ounce broadloom, and a choice of ceramic tile in kitchen, entrance foyer, main bath and powder room.

In the kitchen, there is luminous overhead lighting. For cabinet styles and counter tops, the buyer may select a variety from vendor's samples. The stove area is equipped with an overhead exhaust fan. The sink is double stainless steel, with a single-lever faucet and rough-in plumbing for an automatic dishwasher.

All models have two bathrooms plus a powder room. The vendor offers a selection of ceramic wall bathroom tile, and a choice of vanity cabinets and counter tops to form a pleasing contrast with the fixtures, which are all white.

The vanities have sinks with single-lever taps; also, beside every vanity, there are electrical outlets for small appliances such as razors. Over the mirrors in powder room, main bath and ensuite bath, there is vanity strip lighting.

In the unfinished area of each basement, there is a circuit breaker type electrical panel with 100 amp service, and two outlets under the panel. All wiring is installed in accordance with Ontario Hydro standards, with heavy-duty wiring and receptacles for stoves, refrigerators and dryers. The bedroom light fixtures are in the ceilings. All switches and receptacles are white.

Both safety and energy conservation have influenced the design of the Villas. Safety features include a smoke detector in the upper hallway. Heating and air conditioning are individually controlled; gas and hydro are individually metred.

Each Villa has a mid-efficiency forced air, gas-fired and gas-heated integrated hot water system, and a hot-water tank with a rental contract from Consumer's Gas. The water pipes are copper. There is R19 insulation in the exterior walls, R32 in the roof and R12 in the basement. For convenience, the thermostat is located centrally on the main floor.

The interior walls and trim will be painted with two coats of off-white premium quality latex paint. Except for the kitchen, laundry room, washrooms and basement, all ceilings are stippled in white.

The Villas of 760 are conveniently located on Lawrence Avenue West, just east of Dufferin, a five minute walk from the Lawrence West subway and a short drive to Yorkdale shopping mall. There are schools and synagogues within easy walking distance.

The people who bring you the Villas of 760 have a distinguished history of developing and building quality residences across southern Ontario and the states of Florida and Georgia for over 50 years. In Toronto, major projects include the Sailwinds Condominiums and College Park and the Pavilion.

Construction begins in spring 1995; possession is scheduled for late summer or autumn that year. The prices range from $179,900 to $224,000. Capped-rate mortgage financing is available through the CIBC.

To find out more about the Villas of 760, drop by the office at 760 Lawrence Avenue West, or call Steeles-West Realty Inc. at 256-4098.

Palestinian and Jewish geographers map out peace

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Geographers Ghazi Falah, left, and David Newman discuss their joint research project in Falah's University of Toronto office. [Frances Kraft photo]

The two geographers — one a Jew, the other an Israeli Arab — met 15 years ago as PhD students at Durham University in England. They are collaborating in Toronto this year in examining possible boundaries of a Palestinian state and their related implications.

"In a sense our work is a microcosm of the peace process," Newman said of the academic effort.

The 38-year-old British oleh, who is a senior lecturer at Ben-Gurion University and the son of an Orthodox rabbi, says working with his Arab colleague takes "six to seven times as long" as working alone, but both men feel the results are worth the effort.

"The outcome is a superb academic work," said Falah, 41, a Bedouin whose family has lived in the Galilee for generations.

Since the two men began the project over a year ago under a grant from the Chicago-based John D. And Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation, they have submitted three papers for publication in academic journals and are working on a fourth.

They are not funded by nor affiliated in any way with Israeli government or Palestinian officials, although Newman said "there has been some informal interest."

"We are looking at various options for a solution for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict," Falah said. That involves explaining the relevant issues and perspectives of both sides. Boundaries and autonomy are among the issues they have addressed.

During a joint interview in Falah's office at the University of Toronto, where he has been a visiting associate professor since last year, the pair displayed a good-natured rapport. Newman spent last year as a visiting lecturer at the University of Calgary; this year he is teaching in York University's Department of Political Science under the Canada Israel Foundation for Academic Exchanges.

"I think the reason my ideas are closer to David's is partly because we were trained outside of Israel," Falah said.

"Since when have you come close to my ideas?" asked Newman jokingly.

"Let's say academic ideas," amended Falah, smiling.

One of the issues the two must sort out is that because of their cultural backgrounds, different words have different meanings for each of them. Minority. Security. Terrorism. Violence. Threat. Victim. Refugee. Each word must be discussed.

"We try to use terms which are not too emotive," Newman said. "We want [any] reader to be able to relate.

"It's not good for the scholar to try to label others," agreed Falah.

The collaborative process sometimes entails "a lot of heated debate in Hebrew," according to Newman, who adds that Falah speaks the language "more fluently than most Jews around the world."

Both men believe that, while certain differences of perspective are inevitable, "pragmatic" issues, such as boundary location, can be solved.

"We should not forget that the Palestinians and Jews are cousins," said Falah. "Things change when circumstances change. Human beings are not born to be enemies."

Wiesenthal Centre tracking hate groups

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre of Los Angeles is currently tracking the activities of some 250 hate groups around the world, the centre's associate dean told an audience at Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue recently

In a talk entitled, Nazi Threat: Is It Over ... Or Just Beginning?, Rabbi Abraham Cooper said, "There are triple the number of hate groups in North America that there are in Germany. The good news is that none of these groups has sparked a mass movement."

Unable to recruit adults in large numbers, many racist and hate groups distribute full-color comic books and promote rock music, in a bid to recruit teenagers to their cause. As well, several hate groups are utilizing the Internet — an international system of electronic mail by computer — to make their propaganda and pictures available to all callers.

Since a preponderance of computer users are young, this is another way that hate groups are reaching young people, according to Cooper. "No one really knows what their kids are plugging into [via computer]," he said.

There has been an explosion of newly-available misinformation about World War II and the Holocaust, easily available through computer sources and in public libraries under the topics of Holocaust denial and Holocaust revisionism, Cooper said.

"We have no way to present the potential user of these systems with a way for them to grade the kinds of information available to them."

The Thule Network, a neo-Nazi group operating in Germany, has put instructions on how to build a bomb on the Internet, while another group in Denmark has published an anti-Nazi hate list, according to Cooper.

"The computer is providing an absolute field day for the bigots of this world," he said.

Largely because of computers and modern technology, racism today does not obey national boundaries, Cooper observed. "There is no such thing any more as the democratic process," he said.

Cooper's talk was followed by a public discussion in which Sol Littman, director of the Canadian Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Toronto, was a participant. The event was sponsored by Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

Physicist wins Giller Prize

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was only fitting that the five Canadian books shortlisted for the new Giller Prize were positioned on pedestals outside the Toronto hotel ballroom where the winner was announced last Wednesday.

The $25,000 literary prize, established by ex-Montreal businessman Jack Rabinovitch in memory of his late wife, Doris Giller, a book editor with the Montreal Gazette and the Toronto Star, is meant to elevate the best work of Canadian authors through a rigorous selection process and all the drama of Oscar night in Hollywood.

Jurors Alice Munro, Mordecai Richler and David Staines read 90 works before narrowing their choice to one. Not even Rabinovitch was told of their decision, which was pulled from an envelope before 270 intrigued guests.

Kenyan-born M.G. Vassanji, a former nuclear physicist, won for The Book of Secrets, a novel set in colonial Africa.

"This is St. Urbain Street's gift to the burgeoning world of Canadian letters," Richler said before announcing the winner.

Rabinovitch, who with longtime friend Richler planned the prize over chopped liver at Moishe's in Montreal, is hoping the Giller Prize will surpass the $10,000 Governor General's Award as Canada's pre-eminent literary honor.

To that end the Toronto-based real estate developer has endowed a foundation in perpetuity.

This is the midway edition of Today's UJA. It's half-time for Campaign '95. So far, we've talked to more than 18,000 contributors, enticed fresh faces to UJA through exciting programming and kept pace with last year's contributors. However, we have well over 10,000 more cards to canvass and the toughest task is racing, rather than limping toward the finish line. If you haven't yet pledged, the sooner the better ... Jewish needs never go away.

✡ ✡ ✡

Sometimes, the most momentous ideas emerge from less than glorious surroundings. That's how CITY-TV's fabulously successful Fashion Television was conceived, at least according to its founder, producer and director Jay Levine. There was Jay reading a copy of Vogue magazine in his mother's washroom, when the brainstorm struck.

"The trick really was to do something that is eclectic and working in a magazine and transfer it to television," he told a packed program sponsored by UJA's Young Business Network.

CITY bought the concept and Levine nurtured it from a pilot to a weekly half hour show, famous for its fast moving, glitzy glimpse at a galaxy of super-star models and designers. And what exactly does fabulously successful mean? It means a program with 10 million weekly viewers in over 80 countries and a year long waiting list to buy a $2200 thirty second commercial on the show. Hats off to YBN's vice-chairs for programming Wendy Woods and Barry Rivelis whose grand designs made this event possible.

✡ ✡ ✡

Life insurance can be a tedious, if not downright depressing topic. It's unusual to hear an insurance specialist talk idealistically about "fulfilling dreams." But David Brown is no ordinary insurance broker. He, his sister Golda, and their father, affectionately known as Al G., the company founder, specialize in designing policies that will eventually yield a lot of tzedaka for specified charities. David advised his colleagues during a recent UJA Insurance Division breakfast to consider the charitable market because "the options are limitless." There was also some wise advise from Richard Gordon, the second breakfast speaker. Find your niche. Stick to it, and become financially comfortable enough to walk away from an uncomfortable client situation. Sounds like smart thinking in any business. The guest speakers, courtesy of Division co-chairmen Peter Waxman and Mark Halpern, were so stimulating most participants abandoned their 9-5 routine and stuck around until long after breakfast.

✡ ✡ ✡

What do cows, chickens, horses and hay have in common with 300 young professionals? The answer of course is UJA. Members of United Jewish Appeal's Young Professionals Network decided to do some field work for their most recent program. No more sterile colourless meeting rooms. Instead it was off to Puck's Farm for an Indian Summer evening, one of UJA's best attended events. Congratulations to YPN's Co-chairs Melissa Muskat and Dr. Lloyd Hoffman, and program vice-chairs Anne Gottlieb, Donna Glassman and Joni Rosenthal who are obviously unwilling to pitchfork any programming idea, no matter how crazy it may sound.

B.C. set to test human rights law

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A recent amendment to the British Columbia Human Rights Act is due to be tested by the B.C. Human Rights Council in a case against North Vancouver columnist Doug Collins.

The legislation banning propaganda that exposes identifiable racial groups to hatred and contempt was passed earlier this year with little opposition, except for some editorial comment by the daily newspapers here.

The complaint against Collins is based on one of his columns published in the North Shore News on March 9, in which he expresses doubts about the movie Schindler's List.

Collins, who writes regularly for the North Shore News, a North Vancouver community newspaper, has aroused the ire of Vancouver Jews for years, especially with columns denying the Holocaust. A complaint was laid about the March 9 column by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Pacific region.

CJC also filed a complaint against John Ball, a self-professed expert in aerial photography, for allegedly distributing Holocaust denial pamphlets at the University of British Columbia.

The Human Rights Council said it had received many complaints about Collins and Ball and decided to investigate further. Ball and Collins are to be notified about the complaints and given an opportunity to reply, after which the council will decide whether to hold hearings.

Morris Soronow, CJC's legal counsel, said in a statement that "while we respect the right of free speech as enshrined in the Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, this does not, in our view, give Doug Collins or John Ball the licence to engage in group defamation. We are pleased the issue will go before the B.C. Human Rights Council, and we intend to pursue it vigorously."

He added that this would be the first case heard under the new legislation and "is significant not only to the Jewish community but to all minority groups in the province and others who struggle against racism and hatred in our society."

Michael Elterman, co-chair of CJC's community relations committee, said Collins for years has been writing articles "which CJC believes to be anti-Semitic. However with the March 9 column, he has gone beyond the acceptable limits of public discourse and has written an item which will, in our view, expose the Jewish community to hatred and contempt."

Racists run for office

TORONTO — Members of the white supremacist movement have added their names to the list of candidates in the upcoming Ontario municipal elections.

Heritage Front leader Wolfgang Droege, more familiar perhaps with the inside of a jail cell than with city hall, is running for city council in Scarborough, a suburb of Toronto.

His colleague, Max French, a member of the Front, spoke on his behalf at an all-candidates meeting at the Birchmount Community Centre. French ran for mayor of Scarborough in 1991.

Meanwhile, Donald Andrews is again contesting the mayoralty of the city of Toronto. Andrews is a founder of the Nationalist Party and has been convicted of promoting hatred against non-whites. He has run for mayor on numerous occasions.

B'nai Brith Canada denounced the appearances of Droege and French at the all-candidates meeting as "an affront to the people of Scarborough.

"It is appalling that Droege, a man who has served time in prison for drug and weapons violations, and who has spent more than 20 years promoting racist ideology in Canada, would be given a legitimate forum at which he could espouse his hatred," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith.

"These are joke candidates who have run in the past, have never been taken seriously and never will be," said Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress.

Search for Nazis hurt by political changes

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For years, while Canadians debated the thorny issue of prosecuting suspected Nazi war criminals, concerns were raised about relying on Soviet-source evidence.

Archives documents could be tampered with and witnesses pressured into incriminating opponents of the communist regime, it was argued. So persuasive were those arguments that in the Michael Pawlawski case, an Ontario court refused to permit an evidence-gathering commission to travel to the Soviet Union.

But with the collapse of the Iron Curtain, the arguments against Eastern European evidence have fallen as well. Nevertheless, the breakdown of communism has proven to be a double-edged sword for Nazi-hunters, according to Efraim Zuroff, author of a recent book on the search for war criminals.

While archives are now accessible and untainted by the Soviet connection, first-hand witnesses have become harder to find or harder to convince to testify against people now seen as nationalist heroes.

Zuroff, author of Occupation: Nazi-Hunter; The Continuing Search for Perpetrators of the Holocaust, said that the Latvian government is now offering pensions to former members of the Latvian SS. In neighboring Lithuania, the government offered compensation to those who suffered at the hands of the communists, even those who had participated in the murder of Jews.

Even though the Lithuanian legislation ostensibly precluded the rehabilitation of war criminals, the bureaucrats who administered the plan "didn't check, didn't care," said Zuroff, director of the Israel office of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre (SWC).

Zuroff said the SWC's persistence in exposing wartime collaboration has not gone down well. "I'm public enemy number one in Lithuania. They hate me. I've been there five times in the last three years, trying to explain the history of the Holocaust there."

A condemnation by the Lithuanian parliament against the killing of Jews by "Lithuanian citizens" didn't go far enough because it could be interpreted to refer to other ethnic groups as perpetrators, Zuroff said.

But most Lithuanian Jews, 96 per cent of whom were murdered in the Holocaust, were "killed on the spot by police and murder squads." Many of the perpetrators fled to Western countries like Canada and Australia after the war.

On several occasions since the mid-1980s, when the Deschenes Commission investigated Nazi war criminals in Canada, the SWC passed along lists of Nazi collaborators along with the offer to cooperate with Canadian authorities, Zuroff said. The SWC has been repeatedly rebuffed, in part he suggests in his book, because SWC's Canadian representative

Efraim Zuroff

Sol Littman has been a persistent critic of the government's efforts to bring Nazi war criminals to justice.

In his chapter on Canada, Zuroff states that "left to its own resources, the government has failed miserably in its task, with the real winners being some of the worst of Hitler's henchmen."

Transnistria survivors search for answers

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Why is a region that saw over 300,000 Jews perish in its 132 labor camps, penal and transit camps, extermination camps and ghettos during World War II widely unknown today?

That is what members of the newly formed Transnistria Survivors' Association tried to answer at the first-ever North American commemoration of the victims of Transnistria, held recently at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Felicia Carmelly, president of the association, explained that Transnistria was a political-geographic entity in southern Ukraine, near the border of Romania. The 16,000-square-mile region, existed only from 1941 to 1944.

"Why is it forgotten? It is not on any pre- or post-World War II maps, and the Red Army who liberated Transnistria did not record its findings. The Soviet Union did not consider Jews to be a national identity and did not talk about Transnistria.

"It is our fault that people do not know. We have to start talking. The Holocaust was not just an attack on Jews but an attack on humanity as a whole. We the survivors have been given the gift of life and it is our responsibility to be witnesses."

Carmelly said that Holocaust survivors lived through an experience so terrifying that they carry deep emotional scars. "We lived in constant terror for many years and we watched helplessly as loved ones died a slow, agonizing death. We mourn not only the loss of these loved ones but those we never got the chance to know."

She said that all survivors suffer to some extent from post-traumatic stress disorder, experiencing "guilt, nightmares and bouts of paranoia. Many are unable to fully enjoy happy events. Deep down there will always be a lot of turbulence. So few people know about Transnistria survivors that we feel our experiences are unrecognized."

She stressed that as survivors dwindle, there will be no one left to speak the truth. "Our healing and recovering process depends in part on people knowing about us. Talk about Transnistria so it is no longer forgotten."

Haim Waxman, Israeli vice-consul, brought greetings on behalf of the State of Israel and said that thanks to Holocaust survivors and Yad Vashem, those who perished in the war will not be forgotten. "We could not fight extermination then but we can fight denial now."

Elaine Ziemba, Ontario minister of citizenship, brought greetings from the Ontario government. She commended the group for starting the Transnistria Survivors' Association. "Unless we come together and remember, we will not learn. We must remember people who have suffered from terrorism and continue to suffer from terrorism.

Survivor and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region chair Gerda Frieberg said that she did not until recently know of the "tragedy of Transnistria. It is time that you speak about your suffering and that your stories are recorded. You dare not let the world forget — it is your obligation."

Yiddish stories reflect bygone era

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The world of their Eastern European foremothers is the subject of Yiddish writings never before published in English in Found Treasures, a collection of pieces lovingly collected and edited by Frieda Forman, Ethel Raicus, Sarah Silberstein Swartz and Margie Wolfe and published by Second Story Press, Toronto.

The new book's publication was celebrated at the Jewish Book Fair Nov. 6 with a talk by the noted scholar Irene Klepfisz and readings by Marilyn Lightstone and Vivian Reis.

Rachel Korn

The editors and contributors, who include Roma Erlich, Shari Cooper Friedman, Barbara Harshaw, Ronnee Jaeger, Shirley Kumove, Goldie Morgentaler, Norma Fain Pratt, Henia Reinhartz, Brina Menachovsky Rose and Miriam Waddington, are to be congratulated for saving priceless recordings of an all but lost Yiddish culture.

Though only four of the 18 authors represented in Found Treasures eventually lived in Canada, many of the others had short stories or poems published in Canadian Yiddish newspapers or magazines. At the same time, writings by the Canadians were appearing in Yiddish papers in Eastern Europe.

Sarah Hamer-Jacklyn

Only one of the Canadians, Chava Rosenfarb, 71, of Montreal is alive today. In her story Edgia's Revenge, Rosenfarb follows the lives of post-Holocaust survivors in Montreal, dealing with the morally ambiguous position of kapos, the Jews selected by the Germans to be in charge of their fellow inmates.

Sarah Hamer-Jacklyn, who attended public schools in Toronto after arriving in Canada in 1914 at the age of 9, carved a career as a singer and actress, travelling across North America with a troupe. She later lived in New York. Her marriage ended in divorce and she raised her son alone.

In her story My Mother's Dream, found in this volume, Hamer-Jacklyn recreates the shtetl she left behind 40 years earlier.

Another Canadian, Rachel Korn of Montreal, noted for her nature writing, writes about the chilling Nazi practice of making Jewish families select one of their own members to be deported in her story The Road of No Return. It is set in an occupied town in Galicia.

Chava Rosenfarb

Selections from her autobiographical novel Denah, Denah, by Ida Maze of Montreal, are included in Found Treasures. Her novel was left in draft form when she died in 1962 and was prepared for publication by the Yiddish poet Moshe Shafir in 1970. It is set in White Russia at the time of the 1905 revolution and the pogroms which followed.

Found Treasures is a collection of fiction that gives the reader a social, historical and cultural window on the everyday occurrences of Jewish women's lives as well as on those momentous and horrific times which challenged and sometimes defeated them.

Child Support, 1994-95

The recent case of Willick vs. Willick in the Supreme Court of Canada (released October 27, 1994) clarified the law of child support and how that support can be varied. The Court has also created some arguably new law that may give considerable comfort to access parents who are paying support and custodial parents who are receiving it.

Facts. In 1989, the former husband, an airline pilot, agreed to pay the wife $450.00 per month for each of their two children. At the time, he was earning about $40,000.00 a year, while the wife's only income was support payments and family allowance. In October of the same year, the father's gross annual income had increased to over $154,000.00. The first time the matter went to court, the judge increased the child support to $850.00 per month per child, almost doubling the support amount. However, the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan rejected this approach. The husband argued that once the deal for child support has been made, the deal cannot be changed by the Court, when the husband's income has increased but the child's needs have not. From this point of view, if the children suddenly need dental work or some other service not contemplated by the original agreement, then the husband might have to increase the support if he can afford to do so. However, if the only "material change in circumstances" is the husband's increase in income, then that in itself should not trigger an increase in support.

In its 7-0 decision, the Supreme Court of Canada rejected this argument by tying children's needs to the payer spouse's lifestyle and standard of living. In doing so, it made some of the following statements, some of which are not directly relevant to their main point, but which nonetheless may affect lower courts and the decisions they make throughout the country. Most of the following statements were made by Madam Justice L'Heureux-Dubé of the Court.

1. The Court confirms the "Paras" formula used by the Courts for several years. First the Court calculates the total amount of money a parent needs on a monthly basis to clothe, feed, educate and shelter the child, as well as provide for all his other expenses. Then the Court divides this sum in proportion to the parties' respective "incomes and resources". Here I am particularly intrigued by the term "incomes and resources". Traditionally, lawyers have usually looked solely at parties' cash flow in terms of what they received from employment or business or dividend income. Does the word "resources" include assistance from a person's parents or grandparents on an ongoing basis? If so, the law would take a radical departure from current thinking outside Quebec. (In Quebec, grandparents can be made directly responsible to support their grandchildren.)

2. This formula should not be applied rigidly. The Court must deduct from each party's total income monies that are needed to achieve subsistence, although the children's needs ought to be given priority over those of a parent when determining support.

3. "Judicial notice" must now be taken of the significant levels of child poverty in lone-parent families and of the Court's previous failure to contemplate hidden costs in their calculation of child support award. Judicial notice means that the Court no longer has to consider formal proof of a fact. It's deemed to be true.

4. The child's needs cannot be reduced to a "bare minimum" so that the access parent can enjoy a more comfortable lifestyle. The Court acknowledges that current child support calculations in existing court orders "bear little relationship to the actual costs of raising children". I wonder: does such a statement now "open the door" to having all such previous orders relitigated?

5. The total cost of caring for the child in any given instance is the sum of the direct and hidden costs established by the parties, including reasonable access costs. This is arguably quite new and revolutionary. Many courts are being asked to consider the access costs that parents incur in taking children to movies, feeding them, clothing them, or even giving them overnight shelter when seeing them on weekends or during the week as access parents.

However, judges previously tended to ignore these costs because "all access parents have such costs. If we were to include a calculation of such cost, then the custodial parent would get very little". However, the Supreme Court now appears to be saying that these costs must be considered when understanding the means of the parents and the total real costs of the children, and not just the custodial parent's obligations. Once this happens, the Court has ordered that "the costs of fulfilling the children's needs are allocated between the parents in accordance with their relative ability, having regard to those costs already assumed by each parent and having regard to each parent's existence levels, as well as to the income tax implications of the order". Clearly the Court also indicates the need to account for income tax implications since, for every dollar given to a custodial parent in the support order, a dollar may be deducted by the access parent from his or her gross income, and the same dollar must be included in the receiving parent's income for that taxation year. (This law may soon change. See my previous articles dealing with the Thibodeau Decision.)

6. When calculating costs, the Court must now assume that the financial obligation of raising children is jointly shared but that the custodial parent will generally assume a greater percentage of the direct costs, such as education, clothing, shelter and food, as well as the hidden costs. Surprisingly, Judge L'Heureux-Dubé quotes Professor Ellen B. Zweibel approvingly when she states that such hidden costs include the "present employment opportunity costs" of child rearing. The value of such childrearing "work" must be considered when apportioning the responsibility for paying for the child's needs. In short, the non-custodial parent must indirectly pay the custodial parent for such work.

7. Courts are not bound by the agreements of the parties as regards child support. This is old law restated. However, what is new is the idea that such agreements can rarely accurately foresee how the circumstances of the parties may evolve and change over the years. In fact, lawyers do often attempt to provide for such changes in their agreements. Moreover, even if they cannot, one often sees a clause in the separation agreement in which support either escalates over the years or post-secondary education is treated separately. The legal reasoning behind the Court's ability to ignore such agreements is that the child is not a party to the agreement. Moreover, the Court is the ultimate guardian of children and their interests.

8. Even though a child support amount was agreed to at a certain time and thought to be reasonable then, the Supreme Court has now ordered that present circumstances are the only factors that really count.

9. Perhaps the newest edict from the Court is the statement on children and luxuries. While children are not by reason of income alone entitled to whatever luxuries they desire, they have the right to benefit from the better lifestyles of their parents as circumstances permit.

10. The Court may now take "judicial notice" of the fact that it costs more to support children as they grow older. This is new law. What it means is that a party no longer has to formally prove to the Court the true statistical and other evidence that a child's needs usually increase as they get older. The Court should now merely assume this to be the fact, without such formal investigation. Indeed, this fact is now considered to be as true as such other realities as the world being round, and the impossibility of a 1994 World Series.

In summary, when a parent's ability to pay increases, then the children's needs may now include benefits that previously were not available. The Court ruled that this does not mean "income sharing", but does mean that the children may deserve a higher standard of living, if they do not already enjoy such a standard.

Personally, I feel the lower courts will be confused by the above-listed broad policy statements made by Madam Justice L'Heureux-Dubé. They will be more attracted to a more restrictive and traditional approach taken by Mr. Justice Sopinka who comes to the same result in the same decision, but uses the Divorce Act provisions and precedent case law to do so.

Notwithstanding these differences of approach, the overall effect of this 7-0 decision is to make the ability to increase child support much easier if the payer's income has significantly increased and the child's current standard of living could use improvement.

STREET KIDS: Sex, drugs pose a threat

three offices, the social worker has not been identified in the accompanying profile of a former street kid.)

"It's a little safer for boys than for girls on the street," Kalkstein says. More girls than boys end up being exploited sexually, although both are potential prey, he says. One 16-year-old girl was enticed with lavish offers of drugs from a pimp, but she "had enough seichel (common sense) to turn him down."

Saul Levine

Canada's bad winters exacerbate the danger. Street teens seeking shelter "are sitting ducks for people who entice them into lives that are more dangerous," said Levine.

Girls who get into prostitution tend to "make some money and stay as long as their health allows," Kalkstein says. The problem is bigger in the general community than in the Jewish community, he notes.

Boys, he has found, often romanticize life on the street. "They have a kind of pirate culture. They share their drugs and loot. They're like Robin Hoods, stealing to give to one another. As long as things are going okay, they love the adventure of it, but if they get one good meal a day, they're lucky."

The majority of street teens return to their homes, says Levine, "but it's not as if their problems have disappeared. They need counselling. Sometimes they need to go to a group home. These are kids at risk."

Getting them off the street can take "something dramatic — either positive or negative," Kalkstein says. Getting arrested can have the same effect as becoming involved in a relationship or getting a job.

"Sometimes it's a social worker who makes a difference," says Kalkstein. "Unfortunately that's too rare." Workers are hampered by the number of street kids they see as well as by the lack of trust many of the youngsters have in adults.

Simon Kalkstein of Jewish Family & Child Service, shown in his downtown Toronto office, estimates he has counselled half a dozen street kids in the past four years. [Alron photo]

The best predictor of which kids will do well off the street can be found in their own histories, Levine says. Although it's not a guarantee, he says youngsters who have demonstrated responsibility — perhaps by holding a job or doing well in school — and who have a good relationship with a family member, a friend, or a boyfriend or girlfriend, have an advantage.

Sometimes a trusted relative can act as a go-between for a troubled youngster and angry or bewildered parents.

"Often a family member will stick by [the street kid] until he's ready to turn himself around," Levine says.

It's not an easy road. The legacies of street life may include pelvic inflammatory disease, AIDS, a police record, and infections from using needles to inject drugs. "It affects you the rest of your life," Levine says.

Sometimes efforts to reach troubled street kids fail. "Every now and then you'll get a kid from a good family not being able to tolerate what the family has to offer. To me it's a tragedy, but it can happen.

"If it's a Jewish family — for the most part — you can bet they've made attempts [to seek help], tried to see a shrink, gone to JF&CS, spoken to school authorities. Going on the streets is a continuation of the process of self-destructiveness or a cry for help, but when you have in place the structure and the caring of the family, the chances of not getting into serious and permanent damage are better," says Levine.

Kalkstein reminds parents that teenagers want both freedom and "some degree of responsibility. If you're too autocratic, kids [might] feel they can just take off."

"There's no magic right or wrong [formula for parents]," Levine says. "We have a responsibility to keep our doors open. You can say, 'I don't agree with what you're doing, but I'm prepared to stretch my arm out if you're prepared to grasp it.' And you have to be ready to take that hand."

Levine remains "an inveterate optimist." When interviewed recently, he was planning a conference to be called The Resilience of Youth. He is also writing a book about people who have done well despite their early backgrounds.

Often, Levine has felt he was "making no inroads" with young patients. But once in a while he hears from former patients who call to thank him.

Last year he received such a call from a happily married thirtysomething mother of three. "She used to come in stoned on marijuana," Levine recalls. "Every so often I'd make her cry, but she would stay on the streets, and then she realized she wasn't happy on the streets. This was a girl from a Jewish family. It's not unusual."

Youth turns her life around

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Janine's childhood in an upper middle-class Jewish home didn't prepare her for her four-month stint living on the street.

Five years ago, Janine, then a young teenager, was sleeping wherever she could — sometimes on heating vents or park benches. Often, she walked around in a drug-induced haze, and had numerous sexual encounters for which she realizes now she wasn't ready.

Although her name has been changed in this article, her story is painfully real. Janine, now 20, is off the street, living in a rented apartment, working part-time and attending high school again.

Her good marks reflect the effort she's made to turn her life around. She's been off drugs for a year, doesn't drink, has a boyfriend, and plans to continue her education at university.

"I don't think anything could have prevented me from going out on the streets," Janine reflects now. "I couldn't take authority from anyone."

Friction at home

At home, she experienced friction with her mother and problems in her relationship with her stepfather. Janine's father had remarried, and she preferred not to move in with him, although their relationship was good.

In fact, she credits her father with being her lifeline when she was on the street. She called him every day to tell him, "I'm alive, I love you," and is convinced she "would have ended up dead or prostituting" without that regular contact.

"It's so simple," Janine says, when asked what her father told her that gave her strength. "He would say, 'I love you very much,' and give me a kiss. Just hearing 'I love you,' and knowing it's honest, gave me the courage to go on another day."

Janine came into contact with Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) after she first ran away from home. She sensed that her social worker was "someone who would honestly care [about] me," but her instincts were not reflected in her actions.

Janine missed appointments, screamed, yelled and threw things, but the JF&CS staff member never gave up on her, she says. "[My social worker] would chase me day and night."

Through JF&CS, Janine ended up in a Catholic group home, where she stayed for three years. (There is only one Toronto Jewish group home for troubled teens — JF&CS's Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre).

"The group home was good and bad for me," Janine says now. "There were a lot of really rough and tough kids. I had things stolen. I got in a lot of fights, and I'd never fought with anyone before. I had bad behavioral problems. I got in a lot of trouble for skipping classes and smoking drugs.

"But being in a group home gave me time to grow up. I started smartening up. I started to think, 'Where am I going to be in 20 years with no education?' I looked like a slob, and I started feeling really bad about how people looked at me. I started doing everything I could to better myself."

Today Janine is confident and self-possessed. Her hair shines and her clothes are cared for. She takes pride in her newly honed housekeeping and budgeting skills as well as in her academic accomplishments.

To supplement money she receives from her father and earnings from her part-time job, she receives a stipend from JF&CS.

"I'm very happy," she says. "I would never, ever, go back to a life like I had before. Sometimes when I start to feel like I'm slacking off, I tell myself, 'Don't! This is better than it ever was.' "

Janine considers herself extremely lucky. "With all the guys and all the drugs, I never had any disease. I never got pregnant. I was too young and rebellious to be afraid. A lot of nights I stayed on those streets alone, and luckily I didn't run into trouble. I didn't get raped. I didn't get mugged."

A typical day on the street was long, Janine recalls. "I'd try and stay up really late, so I could sleep through most of the day." She spent a lot of time in 24-hour doughnut shops or video arcades.

She found she could make $10 to $15 a night panhandling outside the Eaton Centre. Other times she would steal to get food.

Some days she was on her own, others with new acquaintances. "Wherever the day took me, I would be," she recalls. "I did a lot of walking, a lot of thinking, a lot of running from my parents and social worker."

At night she would drink or smoke up, although she specifies that she didn't do heavy drugs and was never addicted. "Almost all the kids I knew did drugs. Everyone started about Grade 7," she said.

"I think I was very stupid, very easily taken advantage of," Janine says now.

"Someone was watching over me."

Aging a time of opportunity, says author

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Betty Friedan

TORONTO — Betty Friedan says she never set out to write a book about aging.

"But then, I never set out to start the feminist movement either," she told an enthusiastic audience at the Recital Hall of the North York Performing Arts Centre.

Friedan, author of The Feminine Mystique and the recent The Fountain of Age, was speaking at this year's Baycrest Public Health Forum, sponsored by the women's auxiliary of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Aging, she said, should be seen as a time of opportunity and adventure, a time to "affirm the strengths emerging in yourself."

People reaching 50 can look forward to another third of life, and the possibilities are endless, said the 73-year-old.

"You are liberated from the things that used to obsess you, and there is an enormous comfort and liberation in embracing that."

You realize, she said, "that you don't have to be driven by the things that drove you when you were young."

Many great artists and scientists continued to create well into old age, Friedan said, and slammed those who say they are 70 outside but inside are 17.

"No, you're not. Haven't you learned anything?" she demanded.

When she completed The Feminine Mystique, the seminal book of modern feminism, she tried to find women who successfully combined work and home responsibilities. To her surprise, there weren't many.

What she found, she said, were older women, veterans of the earlier fight for women's rights that culminated in women getting the right to vote in 1920.

These women, she said, "looked more alive than a lot of suburban women I talked too."

Furthermore, she said, they claimed to have missed menopause. She didn't think much about it until she realized that she herself seemed to have missed it too.

"Actually," she joked, "I think I had a hot flash — in August of 1970."

When she began to research her latest book, The Fountain of Age, she discovered much of the research on the elderly had been done on people shut away in nursing homes.

That research was wildly inaccurate for the bulk of the population, she said, but those working with the aged spoke of them with "compassionate contempt, or contemptuous compassion," pathologizing old age as a time of senility and nursing homes.

The two most important elements for a vital old age, she said, are projects to structure the days and ties of intimacy, both of which, she said, favor the experience of women.

She said society must accommodate the new, vital elderly through more services to keep people in the community and maintain intergenerational contact; intelligent and accessible health care; intergenerational housing; and increased use of the very real abilities of older people, such as a council of elders in the various professions.

The question period was moderated by Rose Wolfe, chancellor of the University of Toronto.

Jewish addicts learn to deal with problems

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — To deny that there are addicts in the Jewish community only serves to intensify the problem, says the president of the Jewish Recovery Network, a group of men and women currently in a 12-step program.

"If we say there is no such thing, then we force the Jewish addict to hide. When we talk about addictions, we do not just mean drugs. We mean food, alcohol, relationships — an addict is an addict," Martin told a recent meeting of the Temple Sinai adult education committee.

He said that because of this tendency to deny the severity of the problem, many addicts lose a sense of Jewishness.

"That is where the Jewish Recovery Network, made up of other Jews struggling with addictions, comes in. We help them back into the Jewish community. There are many 12-step programs in churches but Jews should not have to go to a church for help. I praise Temple Sinai for being one of the first synagogues in Toronto to open a 12-step group," he said.

He added that the Jewish Recovery Network has about 150 members, of which 75 attend regularly. "It is an eclectic group of people. There is no common denominator."

Saul, "a grateful, recovering food and drug addict as well as alcoholic," said that the 12-step program and the Jewish Recovery Network changed his life.

"I was overweight as a child and by age 7, I was stealing money from my family to buy food to supply my habit. By age 9, I was smoking cigarettes and as an adult, I was addicted to alcohol and drugs. I did these things just to cope.

"My life changed, however, when I joined a 12-step program and was introduced to the Jewish Recovery Network. I am now happy to be alive and I hope to be able to help other people."

Rochelle Thompson, a social worker and alcohol and drug addiction counsellor, said that addictions are a progressive, debilitating illness.

"One can be addicted to anything — food, drugs, gambling, work, exercise," she said. "Any mind altering experience can turn into an addiction; it does not have to be a chemical experience. Addiction is a disease of distraction. It takes the addict off the normal course of life and takes precedence over family, friends, work, the law and stability."

She stressed that addictions are a problem in the Jewish community and that people can make the choice of hiding from it by pushing it aside or looking at it head on.

"One in ten people in the general population are addicts and we have no reason to believe the Jewish population is any different. We must allow for the acceptance of people and their struggles. Addictions have to do with knowledge, awareness and choice — not will-power."

When asked if recovering addicts have to continue with a 12-step program, Martin replied, "These programs are a blue-print for living. It is easy to get someone off drugs but it is also easy for them to get back on. For some people, balance only comes when they continue to attend 12-step programs."

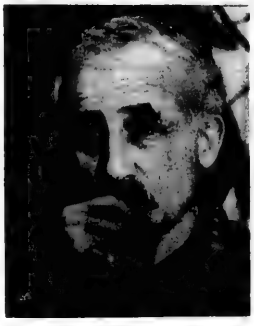
Jewish architects honored

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Jerome Markson



Irving Grossman

TORONTO — Two Jewish architects have become the first annual fellows of the Toronto Society of Architects.

Irving Grossman and Jerome Markson were given the fellowships for their "exceptional contribution to the profession of architecture and the cultural life of Toronto," the society said.

Markson received his degree in architecture from the University of Toronto in 1953 and studied at the Cranbrook Academy of Art in Bloomfield Hills, Mich.

From a modest beginning in his attic-residence, Markson's architectural practice grew into Markson Borooah Hodgson Architects Inc.

He designed apartment buildings, medical facilities, homes for the aged and community buildings, seemlessly blending them into the surrounding environment. He won much praise for the Market Square condominiums, Alexandra Park and the Civic Centre at Edwards Gardens.

Markson also designed the additions to the Beth Sholom Synagogue, the Jewish Community Centre and the Lipa Green Building's Albert Latner Jewish Public Library.

Presently, Markson is working on a community health centre in Toronto and the new Fredrick Variety Art Gallery in Unionville.

The Canadian Housing Design Council has given Markson eight separate awards.

"Jerome Markson represents a tenure of architectural practice and commitment that deserved to be recognized by the [Toronto Society of Architects] and particularly as an inaugural recipient of the Fellowship award," said the program of a recent tribute evening held at Harbourfront's duMaurier Theatre.

Grossman, the so-called "conscience" of the society, graduated from U of T in 1950.

He designed the Administration Building for Expo '67 in Montreal and Crombie Park, a mixed-use building in the new downtown St. Lawrence neighborhood.

He is also known for his exquisite synagogue projects like Shaarei Tefillah, B'nai Israel Beth David Beth Am and Temple Emanu-El, all in Toronto.

"My Jewish education was at the Workmen's Circle school and I feel that my family's working class background, together with my interest in art, led to architecture being a natural creative outlet for me — especially social housing," Grossman told The CJN.

Dealing with death

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A year-long support system built into the Jewish religion helps mourners cope after the death of a loved one, says Michael Benjamin of the Benjamin Institute for Community Education and Referral and Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel.

The shivah, shloshim and the end of the first year shows that "Judaism takes us by the hand and moves us on. It doesn't mean that the pain or hurt is gone, but it does mean that we have to get on with our lives," he said.

Benjamin, who along with his son Mark recently spoke to Tel-Aide volunteers, said the year-long cycle eases people back into society.

"Shivah is a time when people want to withdraw and Judaism recognizes that fact. On the seventh day however, mourners walk out the door so that they understand that even though they may not want to go on, life is important."

Mark said grief is a process, not a single event. Mourners always feel the loss, he said, but they have to move on with their lives.

Another positive aspect to Jewish mourning is the freedom to express one's grief, the Benjamins said. "The tearing of a mourner's shirt represents the coming out of pent up emotions," which if not expressed may cause psychological problems, Mark said.

He said everyone grieves differently, but those whose grief prevents normal functioning should seek professional help. They also said guilt is a normal reaction and part of the grieving process.

"It is important the mourner accept what really happened and work through and experience the pain of grief," Mark said.

"It is necessary to adjust to life where the deceased is missing and redistribute family roles. It is important to eventually redirect energies and reinvest them in new relationships."

Shul youth get lesson in social issues

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — On a recent Sunday morning 300 members of the Temple Emanu-El congregation gathered at the synagogue for a morning of mitzvah making.

The temple's social action committee planned the day as a consciousness raising event to spur congregants to be more active in social issues.

"The goal of today's activities is for all of us kids and adults to start thinking about doing some good things in the community," Mark Sandler, a member of the social action committee, said at the start of the day.

Everyone took part in at least one of 14 workshops, each of which was designed to promote greater understanding of a particular social issue: living with disabilities, poverty in the Third World, family violence, the homeless, and AIDS in the Jewish community.

Martha Rosenberg, chair of the committee, told The CJN participants were moved by Kael Shriar's AIDS presentation. Shriar, a member of the AIDS committee of Toronto at Holy Blossom, has been HIV positive for nine and a half years.

He spoke candidly about the impact on his life. Shriar was told he had six months to live when he was first diagnosed as HIV positive. "I'm surprised today I'm still alive," he told six teenagers and three adults.

Shriar gives companionship and support to people with AIDS and during the final stages of their lives. He told the group, "I have met brave courageous men who have taught me how to live and how to die."

After his presentation, workshop participants worked on a quilt to be dedicated to the memory of Aisha Howard, a former member of Temple Emanu-El. Each patch honored individual Jews who had died of AIDS.

Rachel Telch, 14, told The CJN the AIDS workshop was her "first and only choice." She said it was very important for her to learn more about AIDS "because so many are affected by something we know so little about."

Down the hall, 20 people participated in the workshop on issues relating to the Holocaust and modern hate crimes. People broke into small groups to discuss ways of resolving and combating hypothetical episodes of racism.

Karen Mock, the national director of the League of Human Rights of B'nai Brith, led this workshop. "The students were very responsive," she told The CJN. "They delved right into the case studies."

Michael Goldlist, 11, said he was interested because his grandparents are Holocaust survivors. "I feel very strongly that people should learn about [the Holocaust]," he said.

Several classrooms were filled with adults and children decorating holiday banners for Baycrest. The workshops took place throughout the synagogue in the library, the kiddish room, offices and all classrooms.

Daniel Rosenberg, 11, told The CJN he gained some appreciation for how disabled people go about their daily activities, after participating in the workshop for understanding disabilities. "It's hard being blind and visually impaired and not being able to speak," he said. "It makes me appreciate more of what I have."

Sandler said the day went well. "Many children were very enthusiastic. We have to follow up with them . . . We'll have to feed that enthusiasm . . . Now we're going to have to design a program to complement this day to encourage the kids to participate [in the community]."

Some differences matter more than others when funeral arrangements have to be made

There is a difference but it's not the price

Benjamin's has been providing meaningful, dignified funeral services for three generations. The real difference isn't price. It's the lasting value of experience, and the caring personal service every famly receives at Benjamin's.

On the other hand, there's usually very little difference in cost between chapels. Regardless. The price for identical products and services may vary slightly, but there's no comparison in quality.

According to families who have experienced it firsthand, these differences mean everything.

Drildzer Society turns 60

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The 60th anniversary celebration of the Drildzer Young Men's Mutual Benefit Society was a time to look back to past presidents and a time to look forward to the future.

More than 140 members and their families from the Polish town of Drildz, including second, third and fourth generations, attended the gala dinner held recently at the Adath Shalom Synagogue on Sheppard Avenue.

Founding member Jack Stopper presented a history of Drildz and told of the founding of the Toronto Drildzer Society. Filled with humor, the octogenarian Stopper spoke of the close links formed and maintained between the families who came to Toronto from Drildz.

Silverman, who was surrounded by three generations of his family, appealed to the younger generation to continue working for the organization and to keep the Drildzer name alive.

Celebrating at the Drildzer Society's 60th anniversary are (back row from left) Steve Silverman, David Greenspan, (front row from left) Jack Stopper, Debbie Cowitz, and Jack Silverman.

To honor the 10 founding members, Debbie Cowitz presided over a candle lighting ceremony. Among those taking part were members of the Bliman, Bongard, Hoffer, Kirshenbaum, Schaefer, Stopper, Waese and Zigler founding families.

There was a remembrance for those in Drildz who perished in the Holocaust.

Past presidents Joseph Rotman, Shama Bongard, Benny Greenglass, Henry Godfrey, Morry Kornbloom, Louis Shields, Morris Naiman, Samuel Hirshenhorn, Silverman and Stopper were honored with plaques.

Cowitz told The CJN she "greatly admired the seniors in the Drildzer organization who have persevered through the years and have thus kept the name of this small town alive in the minds of their families."

"As in many families, I am a third generation and my children are aware of their roots and heritage."

Chief Justice of Canada visits Israel

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — The Chief Justice of Canada's Supreme Court, Antonio Lamer, is in Israel this week — the first time ever that Canada's top judge has visited the Jewish state.

Lamer is scheduled to meet his Israeli Supreme Court counterpart, Meir Shamgar, as well as President Ezer Weizman, and to establish the Chief Justice Antonio Lamer Graduate Fellowship in Human Rights at Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Lamer and Shamgar are co-chairs of the 2-year-old Canada-Israel Legal Cooperation Program, a groundbreaking project designed to foster exchange on legal and human rights issues between the two countries.

Lamer's visit will pave the way for the program's second biennial conference on human rights, scheduled for Dec. 11-14 in Israel.

Chief Justice Antonio Lamer

Three judges of the Supreme Court of Canada — Peter Cory, Frank Iacobucci and Gérard LaForest — are slated to attend.

Two years ago, three other judges of Canada's top court — Charles Gonthier, Claire L'Heureux-Dubé and Beverley McLachlin — attended the program's inaugural conference. By the end of this year, all but two of the nine justices of the High Court will have been to Israel.

Lamer is accompanied in Israel by his wife, Danièle Tremblay-Lamer, who is a judge of the Federal Court of Canada.

His itinerary includes a meeting with Israeli Justice Minister David Libai, a lecture to Israeli judges on Canada's Legal Revolution — Judging in the Age of the Charter [of Rights], and private visits to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and the Church of the Nativity in Jerusalem.

His wife will attend a reception hosted by the two female judges on Israel's Supreme Court, Dalia Dorner and Tova Strassbourg-Cohen.

The warm relationship between Canadian and Israeli legalists is largely the brainchild of Prof. Irwin Cotler of McGill University in Montreal, who set up the legal cooperation program with Hebrew University.

Cotler told The CJN that the program's next conference was to have taken place in Canada but that Israeli judges were too busy to leave the country.

The 1996 conference, however, is scheduled to take place in Canada, with the expected attendance of Aharon Barak, currently the Israeli Supreme Court's deputy president and slated to become its next chief justice.

Ontario Liberal leader planning trip to Israel

TORONTO — Ontario Liberal leader Lyn McLeod will pay her first visit to Israel from Nov. 13 to 18.

Organizers stress it's a private visit. McLeod's trip follows visits to Israel by Premier Bob Rae and Tory leader Mike Harris earlier this year.

McLeod will be accompanied by Liberal MPPs Monte Kwinter (Wilson Heights) and Joseph Cordiano (Lawrence).

Her schedule includes a luncheon hosted by Norman Spector, Canada's ambassador to Israel; meetings with members of the Knesset; a wreath-laying at Yad Vashem; a tour of the Old City in Jerusalem and a tree planting in the Forest of Peace.

She is also slated to hold talks with Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert and Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin.

Lyn McLeod

As well, McLeod is to tour the Golan Heights and address the Israel-Canada Chamber of Commerce.

The purpose of the trip is to develop closer ties between Ontario and Israel, said Allan Golombek, McLeod's spokesman.

Canadians to join Rabin, Netanyahu at Denver GA

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

DENVER — For the first time, the leader of Israel's opposition party, Benjamin Netanyahu, will be addressing the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations (G.A.), to take place here Nov. 16-19.

Also addressing the gathering, which is expected to bring 3,000 Jewish communal professionals and lay leaders to Denver will be Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and U.S. Vice President Al Gore.

Dozens of Canadians are slated to attend, including the lay and professional leaders of federations from Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, as well as unfederated communities in Calgary, Edmonton and Ottawa.

The theme of the 63rd G.A., "Building Jewish Community: Contributing to Our Societies," will focus attention on Jewish community-building in the context of the larger society.

Edgar Bronfman, president of the World Jewish Congress, will deliver the keynote address on strengthening Jewish life on college campuses.

"The Jewish community and the federations have been dealing with these facts for quite some time," said Carl Sheingold, program director for the G.A.

He added that being a part of the society around us "doesn't guarantee we will assimilate, but it means that maintaining a vibrant Jewish community is not a simple challenge."

Menachem Begin was the first Israeli prime minister to address the G.A. Gore will be the second U.S. vice president to address the gathering; the first was George Bush.

At last year's GA in Montreal, the policy of inviting only the party in power was harshly criticized by Likud officials, who had hoped for a forum to spell out their opposition to the Israeli peace accord with the PLO.

The policy also drew criticism from a leading member of the ruling Labor Party.

Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin, who had battled to get an American hearing for the Peace Now position when he sat in the opposition before Rabin's election in 1992, last year called on the CJF to hear out both sides of the Israeli political debate.

Speaking at a session at last year's G.A., Beilin said that "automatic support of what the Israeli government does" was a factor in the increasing gaps between Israel and the Diaspora.

Following the 1993 G.A., the Council of Jewish Federations' executive board reconsidered its practice and decided that "in addition to a spokesman of the government — generally the prime minister — we would provide a spot for the opposition."

Netanyahu's first appearance as opposition leader before a major Jewish gathering took place last February, at the annual plenum of the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council. His speech immediately followed one by Beilin.

A day later, the conference overwhelmingly endorsed the peace process.

Other G.A. highlights will include a Friday evening Oneg Shabbat discussion led by Israeli novelist Amos Oz, and photographer Edward Serotta's acclaimed photo exhibit on the Jews of Sarajevo.

The Council of Jewish Federations of Canada was set up a few years ago to represent the interests of Canadian federations.

BB wants ban on Zhirinovsky

Vladimir Zhirinovsky

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and CJN Staff

OTTAWA — B'nai Brith Canada has called on Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi to "ban" Russian extremist Vladimir Zhirinovsky from entering the country.

Zhirinovsky is in the United States until Nov. 14. The U.S. State Department last week granted him a tourist visa, amid fierce condemnation from U.S. Jewish groups.

Zhirinovsky, who has made anti-Semitic and other inflammatory statements in the past, was to have addressed the World Affairs Council in San Francisco on Monday.

A spokesman for the U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League told The CJN Zhirinovsky is slated to travel to Florida and New York before his visa expires this Monday, although it was not known whether he would make public appearances.

B'nai Brith has asked Marchi to keep Zhirinovsky out of Canada, and has written to the U.S. ambassador to Canada, requesting the Russian leader's actions and statements be monitored closely.

Immigration Department spokesman Pam Cullum told The CJN that Zhirinovsky would need a visa in order to come to Canada. She would not say whether the Russian ultra-nationalist has applied for or received a visa, but added Canada "may decide not to" grant him one, "given his views."

She conceded it's possible Zhirinovsky could sneak into Canada.

Granting Zhirinovsky a U.S. visa sends "the wrong message at the wrong time," Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles, said in a statement.

The centre added that Zhirinovsky met with Toronto-based pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel in Moscow in July.

The U.S. State Department defended its action, saying that granting Zhirinovsky a visa does not endorse his views or support his ambitions.

Offers to speak at Columbia University in New York and in Los Angeles were withdrawn in the face of increasing opposition.

New policy poses problems for Russian Jews

And they are also unlikely to have the ability to post performance bonds for relatives, she added.

According to immigration lawyer and JIAS board member Sergio Karas, Russian Jews in Canada face serious obstacles in bringing aging parents or other relatives here under the new policy.

Karas gives the policy a "mixed review" because of its downplaying of family reunification.

"It is a step in the right direction, except for family reunification, particularly from a Jewish point of view," he said.

"It will be next to impossible to bring in an uncle or aunt."

The shift from family class to economic immigrants should help professionals from Russia and Israel, Karas said.

Karas agrees that a negative feature of the policy is its requirement of facility in English or French. That, he said, would especially hurt reunification of Russian Jewish families.

The onus on landed immigrant refugees here to guarantee for 10 years that their relatives will not go on welfare, and to post a bond or surety to that effect, even if it means increasing a mortgage, will make it much more difficult to sponsor applicants, he said.

The new policy requires that a refugee in Metro Toronto must have an income of at least $30,000 with a family of three to be eligible to sponsor an applicant, Karas maintained.

Last year, JIAS's caseload involved 700 families who settled in Toronto, 400 who went to Montreal and the rest, 240 families, who settled in other places in Canada.

Sixty per cent arrived in the skilled or independent category and 40 per cent under family class. That's a reversal from the previous year.

Canadian Jewish Congress too had lukewarm reaction to Marchi's plans.

Shifting the emphasis away from families to economic immigrants "sends a dubious message" and "runs the risk of diminishing Canada's reputation for fairness and compassion," CJC said in a statement.

B'nai Brith Canada had similar concerns, saying that family has always been central to Jewish life.

Hebron tomb re-opens with new security

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

HEBRON — The Machpela Cave, closed for more than eight months since Baruch Goldstein killed 29 Muslim worshipers there in February, reopened on Monday under the watchful eyes of hundreds of soldiers, and with new security and prayer arrangements.

The cabinet voted unanimously on Sunday to open the cave, also known as the Tomb of the Patriarchs, which has been divided into separate sections for Jews and Muslims.

Jewish settlement leaders in Hebron have been told that the cave will be open each day from 5 a.m. to 9 p.m.

Under the new security arrangements, the tomb will be physically divided between Muslims and Jews and there will be separate entrances for the two groups. Jews will pray in the Avraham and Ya'acov halls, and Muslims in the Yitzhak Hall. The Yitzhak Hall is many times larger than the two allotted to Jews, though the Jewish prayer space was substantially increased by covering the courtyard separating the two halls.

There are also special provisions for holidays: On 10 days during the year, Jews will have access to the entire cave, and on 10 days, Muslims will have complete access. At first, only 300 Muslims and 300 Jews will be allowed in the cave at one time.

The tomb is to be open for two days, then closed for another two to allow the new security arrangements to be studied.

In addition to the physical division, 16 closed-circuit cameras and smoke detectors have been installed. There are also metal detectors at the separate entrances.

Guard booths set up

Additional guard booths have been set up inside, and worshipers will not be allowed to bring weapons inside. A police station has been erected outside and will be responsible for security around the clock.

The new arrangements were criticized by both Jews and Palestinians.

"The arrangements have pluses and minuses," said Noam Arnon, head of the settlement in Hebron. "The plus is that the cave is finally reopening. The minuses are the new arrangements."

Arnon said it is "very grave" that the Yitzhak Hall will be off limits to Jews. "This is the largest hall, and the one with the most sanctity," he said.

The Yitzhak Hall sits directly above the site of the forefathers' graves, Arnon said.

Moshe Levinger, the father of the settlement in Kiryat Arba and Hebron, called the new arrangements a "humiliation. We believe if the situation is not rectified now, it will be rectified at a later time."

Muslims, meanwhile, are so unhappy with the arrangements for reopening what they call the Ibrahimi Mosque, they prefer it remain closed.

Hebron Mayor Mustafa Natshe said that "the principle of partition is rejected. It has never been a synagogue in history before 1967. For 1,300 years it has been a mosque. The State of Israel declared in 1967 that Christians and Muslims are safe in their shrines. Why did they change that?"

The limit on the number of worshipers is not acceptable, he added. "Usually on Friday, 2,000 Muslims go to pray in the mosque, so to limit that number is rejected."

Natshe said Muslims in Hebron do not accept that the security precautions are for their own safety. Many see them as measures to prevent an Arab attack on Israelis.

"We are suffering from the unbearable security situation in the city. Whoever wishes to commit a crime, whoever wishes to imitate Goldstein, can do it easily somewhere else," he said.

"Meanwhile, the restrictions around the mosque prevent people from passing through the streets, forcing them on a long detour. About 1,500 soldiers are on our rooftops, in the streets. People cannot move freely, cars cannot pass. All this is against the Palestinians."

CORRECTION

In the article "Justice is the policy of Israel," (CJN, Nov. 3), the last two paragraphs were erroneously attributed to Israeli ambassador Itzhak Shelef. Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress, made the remarks.

Israel rejects overtures for talks offered by Hamas

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Two Hamas leaders in the territories said last week they would welcome dialogue with Israel, but Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin categorically rejected the possibility.

The Hamas statement came from Sheikh Jamil Hamami of eastern Jerusalem, and Sheikh Hussein Abu Kwaik, from the West Bank town of Ramallah. Both were responding to a previous statement from Police Minister Moshe Shahal.

While Shahal advocated that Israel should continue to "fight aggressively those with whom there is no chance or hope of reaching any understanding," he said dialogue might be one form of combating violent attacks by Islamic activists against Israelis.

Kwaik told the Arabic Al-Quds newspaper that the opening of any talks with Israel would be contingent on the release of Hamas prisoners, including the movement's spiritual leader, Sheikh Ahmed Yassin.

Hamami, citing the same preconditions, reportedly spoke of internationally supervised talks with Israel.

Hamas, which violently opposes Israel's accord with the PLO, claimed responsibility for three attacks on Israelis last month: the Oct. 9 shooting spree in Jerusalem that left two dead; the Oct. 14 murder of kidnapped Israeli soldier Nachshon Waxman; and the Oct. 19 Tel Aviv suicide bus bombing in which 23 people, including the perpetrator, were killed.

Rabin vehemently rejected any dialogue with Hamas.

He told Israel Radio that Hamas is "the enemy of peace" and that the only way to battle, and ultimately destroy it, is through a "total war."

Also last week, Rabin was reported to have told the Knesset's Foreign Affairs and Defence committees that Hamas leaders in Jordan have issued orders for terrorist strikes inside Israel.

That contradicted recent statements by Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, who asserted that Hamas activities in Jordan are confined to fund raising.

Rabin also said that Hamas leaders in the territories are avoiding conflict with the PLO, adding that as long as they do not provoke Yasser Arafat, the PLO leader would allow them to keep their arms and not hunt fugitives.

Rabin described the interrogation of 150 Hamas activists detained since the Tel Aviv bus bombing as "very harsh" but keeping within prescribed guidelines.

Rabin said some of the detainees would be placed under administrative detention.

Islamic activist killed

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A leading Islamic Jihad activist was assassinated by a powerful car bomb in Khan Yunis last Wednesday, raising strong suspicions in the Gaza Strip that Israel security services have begun to eliminate organizers of terror attacks.

Hani Abed, 32, was suspected of arranging the drive-by shooting of Sgt. Moshe Bukra and Cpl. Erez Ben-Baruch near the Erez checkpoint on May 20. Hamas and Islamic Jihad both claimed responsibility for the attack.

The blast tore apart Abed's car outside the Khan Yunis College of Technology, where he taught chemistry. The car exploded when he either opened the door or turned on the ignition, local sources said. Abed died in hospital.

Abed was also an editor of the Islamic Jihad's recently licensed weekly, Istiklal.

About 300 Islamic Jihad supporters crowded into his house when his body was brought there. Some fired guns into the air, vowing revenge.

Abed was arrested by the Palestinian Police the day after the May attack, which occurred one day after the IDF evacuated most of the Gaza Strip. He was held in Gaza Central Prison for 17 days.

When Islamic Jihad leaders demanded his release, police said they were holding Abed for his own protection, as they had information that the Israeli security forces planned to kill him. Israel was angered by his release.

A Palestinian Authority spokesman had no comment about the killing.

Polish leader backtracks on invitation to Arafat

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Nobel Peace Prize or not, Jewish groups were not pleased to learn that Polish President Lech Walesa had intended to invite PLO leader Yasser Arafat to attend ceremonies in January marking the 50th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz.

Bowing to a surge of international protest, Walesa has apparently changed his mind.

Walesa, who won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1983 for his leadership of the Solidarity union movement in Poland, reportedly had planned to invite all living winners of the award to the Jan. 27 event.

But the Polish president has backed down on the Arafat invitation, according to Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and the World Jewish Congress, whose executive director, Elan Steinberg, received the word last Friday from officials at the Polish embassy in Washington.

The decision not to invite Arafat was made according to a formulation under which "Walesa and the Polish government will invite all Nobel Peace Prize winners up to last year only," Peres told Israel Radio on Saturday.

Peres is a co-recipient of this year's prize, along with Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Arafat.

However, Peres and Rabin reportedly might still attend the commemoration as leaders of the Jewish state.

Word last week about the invitation to Arafat prompted an avalanche of protest from Jewish organizations. The European Jewish Congress promised to boycott the event and the New York-based Coalition for Jewish Concerns-Amcha threatened to demonstrate.

Criticism over the invitation to Arafat was also voiced by such parties as the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, the Anti-Defamation

Lech Walesa

Yasser Arafat

League, the Zionist Organization of America and the head of Germany's Jewish community, Ignatz Bubis.

Although the Jan. 27 commemoration was supposed to be coordinated by the Polish government and the International Auschwitz Committee, it has become largely Walesa's project, according to Jewish officials.

Rabbi's wife killed

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PHILADELPHIA — The Jewish community here is in mourning following the brutal murder last week of the wife of a prominent suburban rabbi.

The body of 52-year-old Carol Neulander was discovered by her husband, Rabbi Fred Neulander of Congregation M'kor Shalom in Cherry Hill, upon his return home from the synagogue.

Although the results of an autopsy were not available last week, the apparent cause of death was "multiple incidents of blunt trauma" to Mrs. Neulander's head.

There appeared to have been a violent struggle in the house, but officials refused to divulge more details of the crime scene.

The return of German property

Revenue Canada recently commented on the adjusted cost base of property that was returned by the German government after the reunification of Germany (The CJN, July 7).

Where the property was expropriated by a previous government, then the owner of the property would have a disposition at that time.

A subsequent return of the property to the previous owner would be treated as an acquisition "by way of gift, bequest, or inheritance" to which paragraph 60 (1)(c) would apply.

Fair market value

The taxpayer's adjusted cost base would be the fair market value of the property at the time that it was reacquired. The date of acquisition would be determined according to the applicable foreign law.

Where the property was acquired by the heirs of the previous owner, the fair market value and date of acquisition would be similarly determined.

Where the previous owner of the property had died after the property had been expropriated, and prior to its return, there would not be a disposition of that property as a result of the taxpayer's death and the heirs would not be deemed to have acquired the property as a result of the taxpayer's death.

This ruling was obtained by Window on Canadian Tax Newsletter, a monthly publication issued by CCH Canadian Limited, summarizing memos and other documents from Revenuse Canada for the information of the accounting and legal professions.

It was submitted to The CJN by Werner M. Rappoport, a Toronto chartered accountant.

Major Economic Benefits

TEL AVIV — The peace agreement between Israel and Jordan will have significant impact on the economies of both countries, according to Israel's Bank Hapoalim.

Despite drastic differences in size — $70 billion GDP, $12,500 per capita for Israel, and $5 billion GDP or $1,000 per capita for Jordan — the economic department of Bank Hapoalim believes that the peace accord will result in economic breakthroughs.

The bank predicts immediate benefits in tourism — prompted by the peaceful opening of borders — and in Jordan's use of Israel's ports. This enhanced traffic may call for the development of additional highway facilities in Israel.

Potential Real Estate Buyers

TORONTO — Soft housing market conditions have created unique opportunities for potential purchasers in many Canadian cities, according to the Fall 1994 issue of the Royal LePage Survey of Canadian House Prices.

With the exception of Winnipeg, Regina and Saskatoon, real estate activity has been relatively quiet across the board.

In spite of a positive economic outlook, housing markets in large centres continue to struggle, says a Royal LePage spokesperson.

Lingering concerns over job security have prevented many people from purchasing homes. Although lower interest rates have helped to offset declining consumer confidence, housing activity remains flat in most areas.

Discount Book Launched

TORONTO —A new discounting coupon book offering substantial savings on children's products and services will be distributed by several charities and other organizations as part of a major fundraising initiative.

The book Everything For Our Kids will initially be distributed by Shoppers' Drug Mart and Cornerstone '52 Foundation, a leading children's charitable organization.

The discount book will be available at this month's Parents' Show in Toronto.

An Acquired Interest

MARKHAM — Star Data Systems Inc., announced recently that they have purchased 50 per cent equity ownership interest in Multipath Business Systems Inc.

The investment of $4 million cash will be invested over an 18-month period to complete the on-line real time back office brokerage systems for the retail brokerage market.

A Thriving Key To Sales

RAMAT-GAN — Israeli diamond exports for the first nine months of 1994 point to Hong Kong as a thriving key to jewelry sales throughout Southeast Asia.

Worldwide exports of the Israel diamond trade for the first three-quarters of the year reached $2.44 billion net (nine per cent more than last year.

At the same time, diamond buyers from Hong Kong imported $483 million in goods during the nine-month period, compared to $379 million last year.

Israeli exporters also anticipate that October exports will be particularly strong, as September included many Jewish holidays, while in contrast to last year, this October had no festival work interruptions.

Peace dividends add lustre to Israel's image

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Midway through a four-year term as director of the Israel Government Tourist Office IGTO) in Toronto, Ruth Ben-Tzur says she feels lucky to be marketing the Jewish nation as a destination for Canadian tourists, at a time when peace dividends are adding new lustre to Israel's international image.

"It used to be that we were representing a country that was in a strangulating ring," she says, alluding to the once-closed borders of the neighboring Arab states of Egypt and Jordan.

"Israel was seen as a dead-end spot some place in the Middle East, a nation surrounded by walls. But 1994 has demonstrated that things can be changed."

Now that Jordan has followed Egypt's lead and opened its borders with Israel, the Jewish state's once acutely-felt sense of regional isolation has eased considerably, says Ben-Tzur.

One day after the Israel-Jordan peace treaty was signed, she says, hundreds of Israelis crossed into Jordan to see Petra, a spectacular city which the ancient Nabateans and Romans carved into solid rock in a remote desert canyon about 90 minutes north of Aqaba.

"Canadian and other visitors to Israel may easily visit Jordan as well. It's no more difficult than crossing the U.S. border into Buffalo," says Ben-Tzur.

'We're entering a new era'

"We're entering a new era. [Next year] is going to be a year of open borders in the whole Middle East. Travellers to Israel will visit at least three or four countries in the same package."

Ruth Ben-Tzur

The peace treaty with Jordan, the breakdown of the Arab world's long-held economic boycott against Israel, and other recent political and economic gains have spurred international investment in Israel, says Ben-Tzur.

"Business people are very sharp. They understand that this is the time to invest because of the prosperity that will follow in the wake of peace. They know that they're going to see a good outcome," she says.

Tourism to Israel is also on the rise. Ben-Tzur cites statistics showing that tourism generated about $2.2 billion (US) last year, an increase of 15 per cent over 1992. That makes it the country's second largest industry after the diamond trade, which last year earned $3.2 billion.

IGTO establishes contacts

By comparison, agricultural exports (excluding citrus fruit) raked in $558 million and citrus exports made $121 million.

In her two years in Canada, Ben-Tzur has learned much about the travel habits of Canadians, especially those most likely to visit the Middle East. About 35 per cent of Canadian visitors to Israel are Jewish and 65 per cent are not, she says, noting that these percentages are the reverse of U.S. figures.

In that time, the IGTO has established contact with some 3,000 Canadian travel agents, about 300 of whom have gone on IGTO-sponsored tours of Israel to familiarize themselves with the destination "so they no longer need to ask how far the Holy Land is from Israel."

Recently introduced and competitively-priced travel packages to Israel by tour operators like Sunquest, Regent, Conference Travel and Tourcan Vacations are helping to change the perception that you need to be wealthy to visit Israel, she says.

According to Ben-Tzur, Israel's Ministry of Tourism is in the process of arranging landing rights for a Canadian air carrier to make direct, non-stop flights to Israel, a privilege presently held exclusively by the Israeli national airline, El Al.

Excavation raises questions

Recent archeological excavations carried out at the site of the ancient port of Yavneh Yam or Jamina, just south of Tel Aviv, have revived a question that surfaces time after time in archeological circles: Just when did Greek culture begin to spread into ancient Israel and the rest of the Fertile Crescent?

Although it was once assumed that Greek culture became widespread with the conquest of the Middle East by Alexander the Great in 330 B.C., archeologists occasionally unearth more evidence of pre-Hellinistic Greek artifacts, supporting a growing body of evidence that Greek culture had already established itself prior to the Age of Alexander.

This raises still another question: Who were the residents and who were the owners of these items unearthed after more than two-and-a-half millenia?

The dig at Yavneh Yam — a site with a history stretching from the Bronze Age to the Middle Ages but almost untouched by archeological teams — was headed by Israeli archeologist Dr. Moishe Fischer.

Yavneh Yam is located on the Mediterranean Coast, equidistant from the two ancient ports of Jaffa and Ashdod. The settlement's natural harbor was in use during the periods of inhabitance.

Underwater excavations have revealed finds dating from the Middle Bronze Age (first half of the second millenium BCE) to the Early Muslim Period (eighth-twelfth centuries CE). These finds include anchors, fishing equipment and a lead brazier, which were used by Roman sailing vessels.

During recent excavations carried out by students of the Department of Classical Studies at Tel Aviv University in the area of the harbor of the ancient port city, earthenware imported from Rhodes or Pergamon and other Greek cities was found, including Megarian bowls characteristic of the third and second centuries — artifacts dated to a time when ancient Israel was still under Persian rule.

Large wine amphoras with stamped handles common in Rhodes, Chios and Kos were also found. The vessels indicate the presence of a large Hellenized population in Jamnia.

One of the most impressive finds from this period was a statuette of a girl playing a harp.

Other Greek findings at the site were ceramic jars and two types of oil lamps of clearly Greek origin or inspiration, and potsherds decorated with mythological figures in the red-figure style characteristic of the fifth and fourth centuries BCE.

The discovery of an almost whole jug of East Greek character dating back to the seventh century seems to point towards even earlier connections with the Greek world.

Second century B.C. Greek ceramic statuette of a girl playinga harp was found at Yavne Tam excavatons in Israel.

There's a tradition that Jewish children studying the Hebrew alphabet have a drop of honey placed on each letter. This way, as they learn the language, they taste its sweetness.
IT'S NOT JUST HISTORY... IT'S YOUR HISTORY
Being Jewish, you are heir to a unique history, heritage, and culture. Perhaps you feel it sometimes more than other times. Perhaps, at times, you barely feel it at all. But it's there — inside a part of your heart, within a place in your soul. And that's why you owe it to yourself to visit the one place on earth where you will learn about so much — but nothing more than about yourself.

Fifth century shul mosaic floor unearthed

A beautiful and colorful mosaic synagogue floor depicting the zodiac was unearthed last year during excavations at Sepphoris, an important Jewish, Roman and early Christian city located near Nazareth in Israel's Galilee region.

Jewish sources from the 3rd century say there were 18 synagogues in Sepphoris.

The main hall mosaic floor is a single large carpet divided into rectangular panels. A zodiac occupies the centre panel with the months and the astrological signs written in Hebrew. The four seasons are depicted at the borders of the zodiac and include both Hebrew and Greek inscriptions.

The autumn season has been personified by the figure of a woman, a rare example of human representation in Jewish religious art of the period.

Other mosaic panels depict various Jewish festivals, including a basket of fruit decorated with two pigeons that represents the Temple offering for the festival of Shavuot, menorot, shofar, and the four symbols of Sukkot.

The mosaic also contains dedications in Aramaic and Greek and fragments of biblical verses. Apparently, funding for the building was largely supplied by one family, whose names are inscribed throughout the floor.

The excavations are being carried out by archeologists from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem under the direction of Dr. Ehud Netzer and Zeev Weiss.

The archaeologists say the synagogue's mosaic floor is artistically related to the Byzantine mosaics found at Sepphoris during the last two years, although not of the same quality.

The discovery of the synagogue mosaic strengthen the hypothesis that Sepphoris was a centre of the mosaic industry, as were other cities in the east.

Increased tourism forecast as benefit of peace process

There will be a Red Sea Riviera and a Lowest Point on Earth Park, among the joint tourist developments that should evolve from the historic Oct. 19 peace agreement between Israel and Jordan.

The U.S.-Jordan-Israel Trilateral Economic Committee recently convened in Jordan for its fifth meeting to discuss cooperation in tourism between Israel and Jordan.

"This is a turning point for our region and all its economic outlook," said Mordechai Benari, international relations director for Israel's tourism ministry. "It is most probable that an increase in tourism will be the first economic outcome of this new step toward peace."

Uzi Michaeli, Israel's tourism commissioner for North America, said regional tourism will rise substantially "very shortly with this new climate of friendship and cooperation between Israel and its neighbor Jordan."

The Red Sea Riviera will constitute a pedestrian promenade running along the Gulf of Aqaba from Aqaba to Eilat, with cafes, restaurants and ticket kiosks for tourist attractions in the area.

Uzi Michaeli

The Lowest Point on Earth Park would be a Dead Sea area venture with roads linking Israel and Jordan, health spas and visitor centres for information on historical and archaeological sites in the area.

The Trilateral Economic Committee (TTC) was led by U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher, Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Jordanian Prime Minister Samer Majali.

Israel's tourism subcommittee delegation was led by ministry director Eli Gonen, with Benari and Negev Tourism Development Authority director Dany Maayan as members.

The subcommittee agreed to build a road across the Rift Valley in 1995, undertaking joint marketing efforts for tourism writers and travel agencies, preserve the natural and historic environment, develop tourism infrastructure in various areas along Jordan's Rift Valley, and create a joint tourism committee to develop a regional tourism master plan.

A Trilateral Tourism Committee comprised of the United States, Jordan and Israel will provide guidance.

Other area attractions to be built include an underwater nature reserve park in the Red Sea, where divers and other underwater sportsmen can access the famous coral reefs; a Spice Trail Park linking the Nabatean cities of Avdat, Shiva and Mamshit in Israel, Petra in Jordan and the Ramon Crater; and expanded sailing, windsurfing and pleasure cruising in the Red Sea.

"With the long awaited peace agreement between Israel and Jordan and the resulting ambitious plans for joint tourism between the two countries, I think the world will see a whole new dimension in travel to Israel and the Middle East," said Uzi Baram, Israel's tourism minister.

"Once these projects have reached fruition, all previous statistics on tourism to Israel and the Middle East will pale in comparison."

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

Under the British mandate, the Red Sea settlement of Eilat was never anything more than an isolated police outpost in the desert. Forty-five years ago, in March 1949, soldiers of the renascent Jewish state recovered Eilat in the last military operation of Israel's War of Independence. A boom town on the edge of the Negev, its oldest building dates from only 1951. Today Eilat is a thriving resort town (population 34,000) that receives about one million sun worshippers yearly.

More growth is predicted for this hedonistic hamlet, already bursting with haute hotels and hot nightspots. Even before the ink had dried on the peace treaty that Israel and Jordan signed last month to end a 46-year-old technical state of war, tourism officials in both countries had begun to design a dazzling Red Sea Riviera, stretching from the Egyptian resort of Taba, through the centrepiece of Eilat, to the smaller Jordanian resort town of Aqaba.

Last week, the regional director of tourism, Alphonso Nussbaumer, was the featured after-dinner speaker for two large gatherings of travel agents in Toronto and Montreal, courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada.

"Thirty years ago," he said, "if you said to an Israeli, 'Come to Eilat,' he would have thought you were crazy, that you had fallen on your head. Thirty years ago, they regarded me and others who came to Eilat as pioneers, as heroes. Now they envy us."

As with many things in Israel, 1967 was a turning-point for the perennially sunny town where temperatures typically hit 40 degrees Celsius in summer and the clear waters of the gulf, famous for their coral formations, never dip below 22 C in winter. During the Six Day War and for several years thereafter, Nussbaumer explained, multitudes of Israeli soldiers found themselves stationed in Eilat and vicinity, thus discovering that the region's dry heat feels more comfortable than the marginally cooler but far more humid conditions that summer imposes on Tel Aviv.

Today Eilat is the undisputed Miami Beach of the Middle East. All winter long, some 46 chartered jets fly here direct from Europe each week. In summer, Eilat fills up with Israelis, many of whom arrive in 55 minutes from Tel Aviv or Jerusalem on the domestic Arkia Airlines ($80 US return flight). There are about 5,500 hotel rooms here at present, with about 8,000 expected to be available by 1997. Eilat's 32 hotels enjoy an 80 per cent occupancy rate, the country's highest.

As Nussbaumer noted, hotels in Eilat, often built to exacting European standards, are among the ritziest in the country — and feature unprecedented views. "From every hotel balcony, you can see four countries, two peninsulas — Sinai in the west, the Arabian peninsula in the east — and two continents, Africa and Asia," he declared. "This is a unique gimmick."

The Negev also attracts an increasing number of tourists, he said. Vigorously protected as a nature reserve, the desert has generated about 6,000 tourism-related jobs, from camel driver to mountain guide. Overall, the region's potential for attracting international tourists is so impressive that even Saudi Arabia, where the very thought of a bikini is a punishable offense, is allowing some tourist development at El Chagel (the sea turtle), a town on the gulf some 20 kilometres southeast of Eilat. At night you can see the lights of El Chagel from the beach in Eilat.

The borders of four countries — Egypt, Israel, Jordan, Saudi Arabia — converge near the northern end of the narrow body of water known as the Gulf of Eilat (or the Gulf of Aqaba, depending on who published the map you're holding). If present political trends continue, the day may soon come when relations among this diverse quartet of nations become nearly as warm as the inviting subtropical waters they share.

Israel's music festival suits all tastes

Israel, where in ancient times King David played the harp, is these days a land with a vibrant music scene that combines the sounds of many cultures in the new, cosmopolitan Israeli society.

There are music festivals catering to every taste.

The recent Jerusalem Israel Festival saw international artists perform classical music and opera as well as dance and theatre.

Also held recently was the second annual Blues and Soul Festival in Haifa, with the participation of many artists including Ray Charles, the Dirty Dozen Brass Band and Paul Young.

Last August, Israel hosted the Red Sea Jazz festival in Eilat, the country's southernmost vacation spot, which was crowded with jazz fans from all over the world. This festival has traditionally attracted some of the world's best known jazz musicians. Visitors gather to combine sun, sea and relaxation with evening jazz sessions.

And for those who seek classical music, the Arab village of Abu Gosh, some 10 miles from Jerusalem, celebrated the Abu Gosh Music Festival during Sukkot.

This year's performers included Capella Gedanensis — Ensemble of Early Music from Poland, the Rinat Choir from Israel and the Swingle Singers from England singing works by Bach, Mozart and others.

The arrival of new immigrants from many countries has had a vast impact on Israel's music scene.

From the former Soviet Union came many musicians, some of whom were able to find employment with several existing orchestras, including the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra.

But many others have taken to performing in the streets. Indeed, on any given day, pedestrian malls in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem are ringing with the sounds of music from every corner.

The former Soviet musicians have also started their own musical ensembles or their own jazz or rock bands, as did the former Soviet rock star Maxim.

There is also a wide variety of musical entertainment performed in nightclubs and discos. In Israel, the big night out on the town is Thursday and nightlife does not really get going until about 9 or 10 p.m.

There are nightclubs that are popular with the Ethiopian newcomers, where the reggae beat is heard into the early hours of the morning.

There are clubs where traditional folk songs are played and singalongs are encouraged. There are jazz clubs where hard rock and pop music are played and there are clubs that play Rastafarian music combining Jamaican, African and Hebrew sounds.

The night scene is not limited only to Tel Aviv. Indeed, Jerusalem, traditionally considered a more subdued city for nighttime entertainment, has recently gained a momentum of its own and is now attracting many fans, even teenagers from Tel Aviv. They all come to enjoy the combination of an historic city with the latest in music.

Klezmer music, popular in the Jewish neighborhoods of Europe at the turn of the century, has a devoted following.

The ancient, mystical town of Safed in the Galilee has a Klezmer Festival.

Israel is a country that loves music; it has given the world many talented musicians, including Daniel Barenboim, Pinchas Zukerman and Itzhak Perlman.

On a personal note:

Remembrance in Holland

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jack and Lou Spiegel and my husband Joe began working together in the office of Top Top Tailors before the onset of World War II, when all three were in their late teens and still single.

The Spiegel brothers were twins. During the war, Jack enlisted in the RCAF and served as a wireless operator air gunner in Europe. He was shot down on what was to have been his last op before returning home on leave and lies in a military cemetery near Nijmegen, Holland. Lou joined the U.S. Marine Corps as a topographer. (Their parents had come to Canada from the United States.) He was shot down over Guadalcanal and hospitalized but returned to duty and survived the war. Joe served with the RCAF in Canada and England.

Last spring, when Joe and I were planning a trip to Holland, Bill Stern, another air force buddy, called. He had been watching an Adrienne Clarkson Presents documentary when the camera zoomed in on a headstone bearing the Star of David and ... the name Jack Spiegel.

"Joe," he urged, "you have to go to that cemetery!"

Arriving at Amsterdam's Schipol airport, we picked up a rental car and drove to our motel outside The Hague. Under mainly sunny skies, we explored Delft and The Hague, toured Rotterdam Harbor, seeing the very dock area where Joe's mother had embarked for Canada enroute from Poland in 1913; we visited with friends whom our daughter had met on a kibbutz near Haifa and spent an idyllic afternoon at the exquisite Keukenhof Gardens.

Our last day in the area was overcast and misty. Soon we would be leaving for Amsterdam and exchanging our car for public transit. But while we still had our own transportation we thought we should go to Jack's gravesite. Perhaps subconsciously we had been postponing this.

We would have to drive two hours cross-country and, as we looked at the clouds, we almost hoped they would open up. Something held us back, yet something inside said go. Finally Joe decided, "Let's do it."

A pale sun broke through as we approached Nijmegen where we expected to find the Canadian cemetery. On a quiet tree-shaded road outside of town, we did come upon a military burial site but the majority of interments were British. We paused in front of one stone with a Star of David. Below the serviceman's name, age and rank were the words, "Our only treasure." He was 19. Another stone, also with a Star of David, bore the inscription, "He died that his people might live."

Searching the roads around Nijmegen we located two more British cemeteries with a scattering of Canadian graves, but not the main Canadian cemetery. Discouraged and wondering where to turn, we stopped an elderly cyclist as he emerged from a wooden path leading to the almost deserted highway.

"Ach, you want the Canadian cemetery at Groesbeek," he said. "Follow me!" And as if he were 17 instead of perhaps 70, he started pedalling slightly ahead of us along the bicycle lane which ran beside the highway.

There was a small sign: Canadian Cemetery, Groesbeek, and at the end of the road on a slight rise surrounded by open fields, precise rows of stones stretched to the horizon. A tour bus pulled away as we arrived, and only a man and woman remained, just inside the gate.

It was totally silent.

We checked the register on a wall near the entrance and then Joe walked alone, toward all those graves.

The couple came over to me. They were farmers, originally from the Netherlands the man explained, but had emigrated to the United States. Whenever they returned, he would come to the cemetery "out of respect." He had been with the Dutch Underground during the war and he told this story.

In 1944, when Allied forces were pushing forward in Holland, they planned a raid in this sector. "We knew," the man said, "that three German panzer divisions had been sent back from the Russian front to rest here. They didn't know about the Allied plan but they were right in the neighborhood."

The Underground informed British Intelligence about the Germans, but was ignored, he declared. Aircraft and paratroopers were sent in.

"And this," said the man, with a sweep of his arm toward the markers, "is what happened."

It could be argued that British Intelligence did not completely trust the Underground which might be enemy infiltrated or, that in the fog of war, terrible mistakes are made.

Certainly not all the burials here resulted from the bungled operation. There are 2,338 Canadian graves as well as over 250 Commonwealth, Polish and Belgian.

The cemetery is supervised and funded by the Commonwealth War Graves Commission and is beautifully maintained. Some graves are "adopted" by local people and schoolchildren bring flowers.

As the Dutch couple walked to their car, I joined Joe. Standing in front of Jack's grave, he softly repeated the Kaddish and we each placed a stone on the marker. A fine rain began to fall.

After a few moments we turned and walked out of the cemetery into the present, which exists for us and our children and grandchildren because of those who gave whatever they had.

We do remember them.

British film exhibits painful Jewish stereotypes

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The celebrations linked to Jewish weddings and bar mitzvahs have been mocked in many movies, Duddy Kravitz (1974) and Goodbye Columbus (1969) among them.

Now along comes Bar Mitzvah Boy (made in 1976) a 75-minute British film to be shown on Vision TV Thursday, Nov. 17 at 8:00 p.m. to join that list.

It is difficult to find any merit in a film that seems intended to interest the voyeurs who like to see Jews quarreling and engaging in tribal celebrations.

The stereotypes are particularly painful — a vacuous mother worried about her hairdo for the big day, an unfeeling, insensitive father, and a grandfather guilty of the most grating cliches.

Eliot Green walks out of the London synagogue just as he is called to the bimah for his bar mitzvah because he can't cope with the hypocrisy he sees in the family and the world around him. He leaves behind him a shattered congregation.

His sister, Lesley, the only mentsh in the family, finds him in a playground and convinces him to come home again because she understands his distress.

The plot takes an unbelievable turn when the rabbi rationalizes that since Eliot recited his portion of the Torah in the playground, it is okay for the family to go ahead with the dinner-dance with 117 guests that night.

Film-makers have a habit of zeroing in on religious and celebratory rites of other groups besides Jews but that does not lessen the pain.

The film's writer, Jack Rosenthal, won an Emmy award in 1975 for The Evacuees.

The Life And Many Deaths Of Harry Houdini by Ruth Brandon $29.50 Random House of Canada

When he died in 1926, Harry Houdini, born Erich Weiss, was a world-renowned personality. His father, an unsuccessful rabbi, thought his son meshugah when he left home at an early age to find work as a magician in vaudeville and touring circuses.

At the time, he assured his ill and bemused father that he would always provide for his mother. When, many years later, he earned the munificent salary of $1,000 a week, Houdini drove straight to his mother with a bag of gold coins which he emptied into her apron. "He always described this moment when he finally and so spectacularly fulfilled his promise as the greatest thrill of his life."

One of the most astonishing organizations ever formed was the Rabbis' Sons Theatrical Association. Its members had to be sons of rabbis or Jewish scholars. Houdini organized this exclusive society in 1918 and became its first president; Al Jolson was first vice-president and Irving Berlin was second vice-president. Other members included Adolf Zucker, the Warner brothers, the Shuberts, George Gershwin and Fanny Brice.

What did Houdini have in mind? What was the purpose of the group? Was it to combat anti-Semtism? Probably not. He wrote that, "Anti-Semitism may exist in America, but never that I have known. I never was ashamed to acknowledge that I was a Jew, and never will be, but it is awful what I hear from people that are Jew Haters."

Around the turn of the century he achieved a theatrical breakthrough with an innovative act involving a dramatic escape from handcuffs. He added constantly to an ingenious repertoire, every act more dramatic and spellbinding than the other: escaping from straitjackets, immersed in water or buried alive. On several occasions he was suspended upside down in a straitjacket from a skyscraper. Of course, he deftly extricated himself as thousands of spectators held their breath and then cheered lustily, much relieved, when the smiling, unharmed daredevil appeared.

Houdini's career coincided with a wave of interest in spiritualism. Convinced that mediums were fraudulent, he exposed them unmercifully. He became a connoisseur of fake mediums, often incurring the wrath of true believers.

An engrossing section of the book involves his relationship with Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, the creator of Sherlock Holmes, who was a firm believer in spiritualism.

Houdini died unexpectedly at the age of 52. On October 31, 1936, the 10th anniversary of his death, a widely publicized seance took place in Hollywood. It was broadcast live to a vast audience and over 300 invited guests were present. Houdini had always asserted, "If it is possible for anyone to get through after death, that person will be me."

This well researched biography is an entertaining delineation of a legendary magician who was at the same time obsessive in his needs and eccentric in his behavior.

Local exhibition focuses on German resistance

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —An exhibition on German resistance against Hitler is scheduled to open on Nov. 14 at the Goethe Institute, 1067 Yonge St. It closes on Dec. 3.

Eighteen posters and seven 30-minute videos tell the story of the unsuccessful effort to bring down the Nazi regime, which lasted from 1933 to 1945.

The posters, with English texts, form what seems to be a complete record of the anti-Nazi movement.

They also document the attempts against Hitler's life — from Johann Georg Elser's solo effort on Nov. 9, 1939 in a Munich beer hall, to Claus Schenk von Stauffenberg's attempt on July 20, 1944 in East Prussia.

Still other posters pay homage to vociferous anti-Hitler groups like the White Rose, the Kreisau Circle and the Rote Kapelle.

Jewish Film Festival: Some 10,000 people attended one or more screenings at the 1994 Toronto Jewish Film Festival last May, a 25 per cent increase over the previous year. The newly-established Toronto Jewish Film Festival Foundation (TJFF) has received a small grant from the Metro Toronto Cultural Division, and expects to receive a charitable tax number from Revenue Canada soon. The TJFF hopes to encourage the production of Jewish content films for children, and to establish one fund for emerging Jewish film and video makers and another to restore historic old Jewish film footage.

As well, the TJFF intends to offer courses in Jewish film, both to educate and to entertain. The first course — Moguls, Machers, Shvesters and Shysters — examines themes depicted in Jewish films, followed by screenings, in six weekly sessions. The teacher is John Stuart Katz, a professor of Jewish film at York University. Start dates are Tuesday Jan. 31 (Bloor JCC location) or Thursday Feb. 2 (York University). Cost is $65. (416) 324-9226.

According to the TJFF, May and June have become the season for Jewish film in Canada. Vancouver's seventh, Toronto's third, Winnipeg's second and Montreal's first Jewish film series are all scheduled in these two months in 1995. The Montreal festival is set to utilize the theatre at the National Film Board.

Yiddish Exhibit At Beth Tzedec: Beginning Nov. 14, an exhibit, One Hundred Years of Yiddish Canada, is being shown at the Beth Tzedec's Reuben & Helene Dennis Museum, 1700 Bathurst St., Toronto. The display features a collection of unique photographs that depict the rich and colorful life in Poland, where Yiddish flourished, as well as many original copies of poetry and prose by Canadian Yiddish writers. Also look for Yiddish newspapers, a 10-foot hand-painted banner from the Kiever Synagogue, theatre posters, a Yiddish typewriter, and a Yiddish version of the popular board game Snakes & Ladders. Biblical Show To Mark U.N. Half-Century: A new production of Benjamin Britten's inspirational Noye's Fludde (Noah's Flood) will be presented in 1995 as the cultural centrepiece of Canada's celebration of the 50th anniversary of the United Nations, the project's artistic director, Nicholas Goldschmidt, recently announced. "In every sense, Noah's Flood is totally appropriate to the occasion," he said. "It is a universal story that brings a message of peace for our planet, and it features a chorus of 80 children who embody our hope for the future."

Involving a cast of about 140, the production is scheduled to play in various churches in Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa and San Francisco, beginning in June.

Dance Performance in Montreal, Toronto: New York-based choreographers Sari Eckler (formerly of Toronto) and Heidi Latsky (formerly of Montreal) present Half Hidden/Have Hit, an evening of original dance and performance, as part of the Libre Echange series, Nov. 10 to 13 at Tangente in Montreal, and Nov. 15 and 16 at the DuMaurier Theatre in Toronto.

The work is a new dance piece collaboratively choregraphed and performed by Eckler and Latsky with a score by Canadian composer Phillip Strong. According to a press release, it is "a physically driven, passionate dance" that combines "the spunky, strategic jabs, hooks and punches of boxing with the swaying, wrapping, mesmerizing movement of Jewish prayer."

Play wins kudos from survivor

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — "What was it like to watch a play about you?" a young student asks Dr. Raja Englander Zadnikova after a heartbreaking performance of I Never Saw Another Butterfly.

The play about children interned at Theresienstadt concentration camp is loosely based on Zadnikova's childhood experiences.

"I have seen it several times," she answers, "but I was never so deeply impressed like today."

High praise indeed for a cast of high school students who, until they won roles in the play, admitted to being largely ignorant about the Holocaust.

Teacher and director Greg Simpson deliberately chose the play for its dramatic and educational potential.

Before rehearsals even began, he took the cast to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington. The group also met survivors, studied articles, films and books and learned about Judaism from members of the Jewish community. The education was at times so powerful it left the teenagers in tears.

"If we can teach the kids something and take them through an educational process like we've done here," says Simpson, "they still get all the theatre experience, they get all the methods of acting and the training that is required, but at the same time, when the play's finished, they leave with an incredible knowledge, in this case of the Holocaust, Terezin, Jewish culture and tradition."

The students from Ashbury College, a private school in Rockcliffe Park, first staged the play last spring. The production was so moving, the Ottawa Shoah Remembrance Committee and Congregation Machzikei Hadas asked the cast to do a second run in October.

But this time, Celeste Raspanti, the playwright and a professor at the University of St. Thomas in Minnesota, and Zadnikova herself would be there to watch and to answer questions from student and adult audiences.

The play was inspired by the poems and paintings left by the children who passed through Theresienstadt, or Terezin, Hitler's "gift to the Jews".

The model ghetto, in the hills not far from Prague, was featured in Nazi propaganda films and even visited by an International Red Cross delegation in 1944, after being hurriedly prettied up with trees, flowers and paint.

In reality, Terezin was a forced labor camp and depot for Jews destined for Auschwitz. Of the 15,000 children who passed through the ghetto, fewer than 100 survived.

Because Terezin was close to the major European cultural centres, it housed a large population of Jewish intellectuals. They secretly organized classes for the children. They taught from memory, since there were few books, and encouraged the children to draw and write.

I Never Saw Another Butterfly revolves around Raja Englanderova, a young teenager played by Jamie Wisniowski, and a teacher, Irena Synkova, played by Tara Story, who mends her broken spirit.

While most of the Terezin survivors settled outside Europe, Zadnikova and her mother returned to Prague after the war. They believed it was the dawn of a new age.

Canada's top judge visits Old City despite objection

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — The visit here last week of Canada's Chief Justice, Antonio Lamer, sparked controversy and once again highlighted the rift between Canadian and Israeli positions on Jerusalem.

Lamer, who was in Israel under the auspices of the Canada-Israel Legal Cooperation Programme (CILCP), was planning to visit a number of sites in the company of his host, Israel's Chief Justice Meir Shamgar.

However, the Canadian Embassy objected to the proposed itinerary, arguing that visits to the Old City of Jerusalem and Bethlehem could not be made with an Israeli escort.

Canada does not view Israeli control of East Jerusalem as legitimate.

Canadian officials instead asked for a neutral escort for Lamer, a request Israel denied citing security reasons. Shamgar and other Israeli judges then boycotted a reception at the home of Canadian Ambassador Norman Spector.

In the end though, Lamer visited the Western Wall without notifying anyone.

"Our policy is that any Canadian official visiting the territories, including East Jerusalem, should do so under the auspices of Canada," explained Spector, arguing that an Israeli escort would imply Canadian acceptance of Israel's occupation of the territories.

However, McGill University law professor Irwin Cotler, who organized the visit, maintains that the intervention of the embassy served only to politicize what was a non-political visit.

Chief Justice Antonio Lamer

"If the Canadian government had not intruded, this would have been a normal visit with no political overtones," said Cotler, architect of the CILCP, a joint venture in human rights and law reform between Canada and Israel.

The Israeli Foreign Ministry "cannot accept the Canadian policy," said Oren David, head of the ministry's Canada Desk.

"The fact that a foreign dignitary is escorted by an Israeli does not suggest support for a permanent Israeli occupation of the territories."

David said that according to international law, Israel is responsible for maintaining security and order in the disputed areas. "So it is natural for us to escort foreign dignitaries visiting the territories."

Spector said Canadian policy is no different than that of any other Western embassy, noting that even U.S. President Bill Clinton cancelled his planned visit to the Old City when it became clear he was to be accompanied there by Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert.

"Lamer is not Clinton," countered Cotler. "He is not a politician, and he makes no political decisions."

Shamgar would not comment to the press.

The incident marked the first time foreign dignitaries escorted by Shamgar were advised by their embassies to change their plans.

Even a request that Shamgar accompany Lamer to the Western Wall was rejected by the Canadian ambassador, Cotler said. "It is unacceptable that an Israeli official cannot escort a Canadian official to the most sacred site in Judaism."

Gaza police round up bomb suspects

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Gaza police have arrested nearly 200 Islamic Jihad supporters since last Friday's suicide bomb attack that killed three Israeli reserve soldiers.

Six other soldiers and six Palestinians were wounded in the attack, carried out by a suicide bomber riding a bicycle near an IDF checkpoint at Netzarim.

The Palestinian Authority "must now hit the extremists hard because they are challenging its ability to rule, Justice Minister Freih Abu Meidin said Sunday.

"What we saw last week in Iranian-style parades, firing Kalashnikov rifles and M-16s provoking the people, this means there are two authorities in the Gaza Strip. This is completely forbidden," he told The Jerusalem Post. "One more demonstration like that and everything will go with the wind."

CANADA

Congrats to Cardinal

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region has welcomed the elevation of Montreal Archbishop Jean-Claude Turcotte to the rank of cardinal as befitting a man whose life "has been dedicated to the service of the church and thereby the welfare of man.

"The nomination of Most Rev. Turcotte to the rank of cardinal by Pope John Paul II confirms the importance of the work performed by this man of the church within the framework of his varied duties," CJC Quebec region chair Manuel Shacter said in a statement.

Turcotte, 58, has been Archbishop of Montreal since 1990, and was one of 30 Roman Catholic leaders elevated to the rank of cardinal by the Pope on Oct. 30.

J.R. Taylor Dies

EDMONTON — The grand old man of Canada's neo-Nazi movement, John Ross Taylor, died here last week following a heart attack. He was 80.

Ross, who was buried in Toronto, was a former head of the far-right Western Guard Party and of Aryan Nations. He had ties to neo-Nazi and white supremacist groups around the world.

Taylor's involvement in fascist circles began in the 1920s. During World War II, he was jailed for his activities.

In 1981, he began serving a one-year prison sentence for defying a court order to stop playing anti-Semitic telephone messages. He was found to be contempt again in 1984. In 1990, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld the banning of his racist hotline.

Temple Sinai Dinner

TORONTO — More than 100 theology students from the University of Toronto attended a recent dinner at Temple Sinai, sponsored by Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto, Chatauqua and Temple Sinai's brotherhood. Rabbi Jordan Pearlson brought the students up to date on Christian-Jewish relations, the Vatican's recognition of Israel and other issues.

ISRAEL

Poverty in Israel

JERUSALEM — Despite a booming Israeli economy, about 12 per cent of the population, or some 648,000 people, lived below the poverty line in 1993, according to the National Insurance Institute.

The report released last week said the number of Israeli poor in 1993 rose by 5.4 per cent over the previous year. But there were marked increases among large families and the the elderly.

According to the report, the number of elderly poor rose by 16 per cent and the number of families below the poverty line increased by 13 per cent over the previous year. The figures showed that some 279,000 Israeli children were living in poverty.

Ties With Oman?

JERUSALEM — The Persian Gulf state of Oman may be the next Arab country to establish full diplomatic ties with Israel.

Without providing details, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said last week that an Arab state would take the step in January. According to local media reports, the most likely candidate is Oman.

Oman has maintained a secret relationship with Israel for 15 years, including a permanent Israeli presence on Omani soil, it was reported here.

The newspaper Ha'aretz reported that the Omani foreign minister has secretly visited Israel "more than once."

Cholera Scare

TEL AVIV — Israeli health authorities last week banned the import of fruit and vegetables from the Gaza Strip to prevent the spread of what they said was an outbreak of cholera there.

Palestinian officials said the outbreak was a rumor prompted by the admission to a Gaza hospital of a Palestinian family suffering from what was first thought to be cholera. The diagnosis was later changed to stomach infections.

Israeli health authorities say vegetables and fruits from Gaza are frequently grown in fields irrigated with untreated sewage water or from infected wells.

U.S. Embassy in J'lem?

JERUSALEM — The United States has reportedly signed an agreement to develop a plot of land in Jerusalem on which a new embassy will be built.

The U.S., along with most other foreign countries, has never officially recognized Jerusalem as the capital of Israel, maintaining only consular offices there while keeping its embassy in Tel Aviv.

According to a recent issue of The Jerusalem Report, construction at the site will be completed in 1999. Israeli sources were quoted as saying that when Israel and Palestinians resolve all outstanding issues regarding Jerusalem, the U.S. will declare the building its new embassy.

A Palestinian ORT?

JERUSALEM — International organizations have approached ORT to assist in establishing technological schools in areas of the Palestinian Authority, Dr. Ellen Isler, the director-general of ORT International, said recently.

The organizations were willing to fund the network's operations in Gaza and Jericho, she said, and the project's feasibility was being examined.

Plans are already underway to assist Jordan with a similar scheme, ORT's Israel director Yisrael Goralnik revealed.

WORLD

Paris Shul Vandalized

PARIS — Vandals broke into the synagogue and community centre in the Parisian suburb of Garges-Les-Gonesses last week, ransacking rooms, overturning furniture and breaking into the ark.

While the vandals left the synagogue's Torah scrolls untouched, they scribbled graffiti on the walls in French and in "broken Arabic," according to a Jewish official.

"We'll blow you up," read one message, followed by the initials FIS in French and Arabic.

FIS is the French acronym for the Islamic Salvation Front, a fundamentalist terror group opposed to the current government in Algeria.

Tear Gas Attacks

PARIS — The Paris premiere of Zahal, a five-hour documentary film by Claude Lanzmann about the Israeli Army, was disrupted by tear-gas attacks last Wednesday in both movie theaters where it was being screened.

At one theatre, two people lobbed a tear-gas grenade, triggering panic among spectators. Three people were hurt.

At a second theatre, three people threw a tear-gas grenade. There were no injuries there.

An anonymous caller, saying he was speaking on behalf of an extreme-right-wing student organization called Groupe Union Defence, claimed responsibility.

The caller said the attacks were made "in solidarity with the Palestinian people, victim of the daily atrocities of the Zionist occupation army."

New Czech Deal

PRAGUE — The Czech Parliament has adopted legislation to compensate victims of the Nazis who reside in what is now the Czech Republic.

The legislation awards Czech citizens who were prisoners in Nazi camps during the German occupation of Czechoslovakia the sum of 2,300 Crowns — the equivalent of $80 (U.S.) — for every month in detention.

In addition, one-time payments of 100,000 crowns, or about $3,500, will be paid to resident surviving spouses of deceased Nazi camp survivors.

The payments are available only to current Czech citizens and not those living in what is now Slovakia.

Germany Marks Nov. 9

BONN — Germany last Wednesday commemorated two significant dates in its modern history: the 56th anniversary of Kristallnacht and the fifth anniversary of the fall of the Berlin Wall.

In a ceremony at the Reichstag in Berlin, Ignatz Bubis, chairman of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, declared Nov. 9 not only a day of rejoicing over the fall of the wall, but as one of remembrance of the 1938 pogrom that marked the beginning of the end for European Jewry.

Syria, EU Talks

BRUSSELS — In a move aimed at relaunching economic and political ties that were broken off several years ago between Syria and the European Union, Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa will meet his 12 EU counterparts here at the end of the month.

Citing human rights violations, the European Parliament — the EU's legislative body — has been blocking aid to Syria, valued at some $370 million (U.S.).

But earlier this year, the Parliament unblocked the aid, citing improvements in Syria's human rights record as well as a desire to move the Middle East peace process forward.

STREET KIDS: Someone else's problem?

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Ronald Weiss, director of chaplaincy services for the Jewish community, believes that "the Jewish community, as a community, sees [the issue of street kids] as someone else's problem.

"Jewish kids are good kids, and good kids don't run away. That's the stereotype," Rabbi Weiss said from his office at Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS)

"Just as there are Jews in prisons, there are Jews who are on the street. To pretend that there are no Jewish kids out there is a denial of reality."

Rabbi Ronald Weiss

Allocation of funding — to deal with a myriad of societal problems — is another reality the Jewish community faces. "In this day and age of fiscal austerity, how do you weigh the relative worth of one important need against another? Where do you spend money so that it will make a difference?"

Even if there weren't Jewish street kids, Rabbi Weiss noted, Jewish tradition "mandates our involvement in the society in which we live. It's our responsibility to make that society a better one for all who live there.

"All human life is precious. There's a statement in the Talmud which says, 'He who saves even one life, it is as if he saved the entire world'."

Because each case is unique, Rabbi Weiss is reluctant to offer specific solutions to the issue of street kids. "There is a need to strengthen the community, to make it a more productive environment in which people can have a meaningful life."

Although the rabbi hasn't seen any Jewish street kids in his four months as chaplain, he dealt with the problem as a pulpit rabbi in Binghamton, N.Y., where he served for nine years and was consulted by a small number of families whose adolescent children were on the street.

Rabbi Weiss would like to see people make use of the services offered by JF&CS and by similar agencies in other cities. He cautions that not all rabbis have the training to deal with the wide variety of problems about which they are consulted.

"To the best of my knowledge, while all of the rabbinical seminaries deal with counselling issues as part of the curriculum, they are on the periphery of the rabbinical studies and, as such, students do not get as much training as they may need when they're out in the field dealing with very personal situations.

"If people are going to turn to a rabbi for counsel, they should seek out a rabbi with whom they can develop a rapport and feel comfortable with. If a rabbi is honest with himself and with his congregants, he will be very clear about delineating his own limits and know when to refer to a psychiatrist or other professional."

The rabbi would urge anyone with problems to seek help before going out on the street. "It's much easier to resolve the situation when you have a home than when you are fighting for your daily survival. When food and shelter are provided, you can focus on your problems."

The Eaton Centre, in downtown Toronto, is a destination for some street kids seeking shelter from bad weather. [Frances Kraft photo]

A teen's cry for help

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "The first time they locked the door, I cried," remembers Todd, 17.

Todd (not his real name) is a former street kid who landed in jail two years ago after a run-in with a youth who had threatened a friend of his.

"I value friendship a lot," says Todd. He doesn't get along with rich kids, he adds somewhat ironically, recalling the comfortable home in which he grew up.

Todd also values his Jewish heritage, he says. He attended a Jewish day school and later a sup-

New CJN editor committed to community

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Mordechai Ben-Dat becomes editor of The CJN on Dec. 12, he will bring to the paper a longstanding interest in journalism along with a deep commitment to the Jewish community.

Over the past several years the 44-year-old Toronto-born lawyer has been a regular editorial writer for The CJN, in addition to preparing articles, reports and speeches as a partner in Dyadem Fine Writing.

An active volunteer in a number of Jewish community organizations, Ben-Dat is currently co-chair of Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto education committee.

Mordechai Ben-Dat

He and his wife Lyn have four daughters, age 10 to 17.

Ben-Dat comes to The CJN from the Clinic Funding Office of the Ontario Legal Aid Plan, where he has worked as a staff lawyer since 1992.

He believes that The Canadian Jewish News "can and does already reflect the richness and the diversity of the Jewish community in Canada. A large part of my role is to help [staff] reach even higher."

Ben-Dat sees the role of the paper as "first and foremost to inform, but [beyond that to] occcasionally entertain, to inspire.

"I hope it will provoke thinking and stimulate imagination, maybe occasionally cause someone to shed some tears."

Ben-Dat wants people to know that he feels "a responsibility to the community. I want everybody to have the sense that participation in The CJN will make a difference in the lives of others."

Ben-Dat's commitment to making a difference was shaped in part by a year he spent in Israel counselling immigrant families from North Africa in the early 1970s, as part of the Sherut La'am program.

He is fluent in Hebrew and Yiddish, and has a working knowledge of French.

With the exception of a 14-month stint as director of research and editor for the Canada-Israel Committee, Ben-Dat has held a number of government positions.

Both he and his CJN predecessor, Patricia Rucker, held advisorships in the Liberal government of Ontario in the mid-1980s, and they worked together briefly in 1987 in the Ministry of Citizenship. Rucker has left The CJN to take a position on the Immigration and Refugee Board of Canada.

Ben-Dat sees his appointment as editor as "not so much a change in direction as a natural extension."

It was a tough trek on foot across the Sudan and many died along the way, including Rakefet's mother. Now they have no regrets about being rescued from Ethiopia by the UJA-funded Jewish Agency. There was no mistaking Sasson's ardent Zionism when he got a chance at CHAT (Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto) to ask Canadian kids some questions. Necessity said to have pushed Arabs to peace

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — A sober analysis of the problems of peace-making in the Middle East was in sharp contrast with the warm tributes given to two brothers with a distinguished record of community leadership.

At a recent State of Israel Bonds — B'nai Brith breakfast held at Temple Anshe Sholom in honor of Abe and Larry Szpirglas, the featured guest speaker was Howard Stone, a former executive director of the Zionist Organization of America.

Stone, an American who first went to Israel over 30 years ago, stated at the outset that "the overriding motive for all of us must be to support a full and comprehensive peace between Israel and its Arab neighbors."

But, he said, for the Arabs, peace means victory over Israel. "Be very clear about it. No Arab leader today is sitting down and talking to Israel because he suddenly loves Jews . . . [nor] has any Arab leader to this day explained to his own people the change in Arab-Israeli relations in any terms other than that of pragmatic necessity."

In the Middle East, Stone said, "killing is a way of life and the only thing that has ever stopped the killing . . . is fear and frustration and pain."

Change came about, he said, partly because the Arabs began to realize that the endless "striking back as much as they struck us" was making their lives miserable, and that Israel would do whatever was necessary for its own security.

They also saw hundreds of thousands of Jews from the Soviet Union pouring into Israel, and they understood that Jews everywhere "were prepared to stand by Israel, even in its most difficult days."

He warned that in the coming months there would be more Arab terrorism. He noted it is important to distinguish between sovereign Arab nations such as Egypt, Jordan, Morocco and some of the Gulf States, with whom "you have the right to hope that [a peace agreement] will last," and an agreement signed with the PLO, which he feels might not "be worth the paper it is written on."

Since the signing of the Jericho Accords, he said, "Israel has seen the worst terrorism since the state was founded in 1948 . . .with 97 Israelis killed, 930 wounded, 1,263 fire bombs thrown and 295 people stabbed. . . What kind of peace is this?"

Former Jewish Community Centre (JCC) executive director, Sam Brownstone, delivered the official tribute to the Szpirglas brothers, from their earliest days at Camp Kadimah in the 1950s to their present leadership roles.

John Levy presented them with the Jerusalem City of Peace Award.

In their response, Abe, a lawyer, and Larry, president of a home-building company, paid tribute to their parents, Polish-born survivors, Anna and Sam Szpirglas, who taught them respect and consideration for others, hard work and the value of education.

They also thanked their role models at the JCC, Brownstone, the late Max Rotman and former executive director, Bill Stern.

Both also called on more people to become involved.

Hamilton Mayor Bob Morrow shared memories of their high school days together, when the three played in the school band.

B'nai Brith Canada president, Brian Morris, promised the organization's continuing support for Middle East peace efforts.

Breakfast co-chairs were David Burman, Viceroy Reading Lodge, and David Walman, Hamilton Lodge. Judge George Czutrin thanked the guest speaker.

Escape through Quebec

TORONTO — A "mini rat line" was established after World War II to allow French Nazi collaborators to escape to Quebec, says historian Esther Delisle.

The escape route permitted several high-ranking officials in France's wartime Vichy regime to settle in Quebec for a number of years, Delisle told a synagogue audience last week, in a talk sponsored by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem as part of Holocaust Education Week.

Delisle is the author of The Traitor and the Jew, a scathing look at the anti-Semitism and extreme right-wing nationalism of Quebec from 1929 to 1939.

Her latest research, she said, reveals that Quebec's francophone elite in the late 1940s — professors, clergy and politicians — knew about and, in some cases, sheltered the French collaborators.

She described the research as "touchy," adding that several archives on the subject are either missing or have sections blackened out.

In 1952, Canada's immigration minister said he could not release the files because it would embarrass a foreign power and endanger the public good, Delisle said.

She said two high-ranking French collaborators — Georges Montel and Jacques de Bernonville — entered Quebec after the war using false papers and stayed for several years.

Many Nazi collaborators were sheltered by the Benedictine religious order in France following the war, she added.

New hate crimes law will be passed: Gray

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Herb Gray

TORONTO — Canada's proposed far-reaching hate crime legislation is not being held up by the Liberals, says federal Solicitor General Herb Gray.

The bill will be passed, Gray assured The CJN during a recent talk at Beth Sholom Synagogue.

Bill C-41, which passed second reading last month and is now headed to committee hearings, would "ensure harsher sentences for crimes motivated by hate, based on race, nationality, color, religion, sex, age, mental or physical disability or sexual orientation."

In other words, judges would be allowed to mete out stiffer sentences to perpetrators of a hate crime than if the crime was motivated by other factors.

But several members of the Liberal caucus — some estimates say as many as 60 — oppose the bill. Some have joined Nova Scotia Liberal MP Roseanne Skoke in a bid to purge the bill of any mention of sexual orientation. Others, like MP Dan McTeague, want assurances that legal protection will not be extended to those who engage in bestiality, necrophilia, pedophilia and other illegal aspects of sexual orientation.

Skoke has gone on record as saying homosexuality is abnormal and immoral and not deserving of legal protection.

The bill "is not being held up. It's being discussed and it will be passed," Gray said.

The bill has passed second reading and is being sent to the standing committee on justice, of which Skoke is an associate member. Some observers say it could become law by next summer.

Justice Minister Alan Rock is scheduled to go before the justice committee this week. Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith expect to appear or file briefs in the coming weeks.

In his remarks, Gray said his government is fighting hate with a two-pronged strategy: "appropriate" legislation to battle hate crimes, and "attacking hate crimes where they start: in the hearts and minds of people."

Laws "can lessen visible manifestations of hate, but we need to reach people at risk."

Gray touched only briefly on the allegations swirling around the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS). He said charges that CSIS channeled money to informant Grant Bristow — funds then allegedly used to establish the neo-Nazi Heritage Front — "are just allegations."

Gray said a parliamentary committee is looking into the charges and he promised the government "will not hestitate to take action on the basis of real proof."

Arafat reappraising position: Herzog

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Yasser Arafat has no alternative but to take extreme action against terrorists," Chaim Herzog, president of Israel from 1983-1993, told an overflow audience here last Sunday.

"He [Arafat] is undergoing an agonizing reappraisal at the moment. We're not quite sure the Palestine police are trying hard enough [to combat terrorism]," Herzog told the audience of 600 at the Jewish Book Fair at the Leah Posluns Theatre of the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

"Araft will be deposed as leader of the PLO if he does not succeed in controlling terrorism," he said.

Nearly all the questions to Herzog related to terrorism, indicating concern in the audience about the safety of the Israeli people.

"The suicide bombers are a great danger," Herzog said. "They are backed by Iran and tolerated by Syria. We can't do much about it. It is a major threat to Arafat."

Terrorists pose such a threat to the whole world, not only to Israel, that western countries must put pressure on countries like Iran, Herzog said.

Though 30 to 40 per cent of Palestinians support Hamas, a majority of Palestinians favor the peace process, he said.

"Israelis and Palestinians have gone beyond the point of no return [in the peace process]. I am in no way minimizing the obstacles, but despite the obstacles, the road ahead is quite clear."

Peace with Jordan and the prospect of peace with other Arab countries has "opened up vistas of economic opportunity that are mind boggling," Herzog said.

The former Israeli president declared: "I am personally convinced that we will achieve peace with the PLO."

The main reason for his belief, he said, is that the economies of Israel and the Palestinian areas are intertwined and the prosperity of the Palestinians depends on peaceful relations.

Another reason for his optimism is that the Palestinians realize the true nature of the situation. "The Palestinians are attuned to the type of political debate we have in Israel. They know as much about current affairs as many Israelis. They have developed a grudging admiration for the Israeli process."

In answer to other questions, Herzog said there is no intention on the part of the Israeli government to negotiate the status of Jerusalem or to move the Jewish settlements now in the Palestinian areas.

As to the incident in which the mayor of Jerusalem was not allowed to accompany the Turkish prime minister on a visit to the Western Wall, Herzog said there is now a bill before the Knesset to correct the situation. "It won't happen again," he said.

Vancouver Holocaust Centre opens doors

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The official opening of the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre (VHC) on Nov. 7 marks the fulfilment of a promise made 10 years ago by the 400 members of the local Holocaust community

The goal is to leave a permanent legacy of Nazi horrors so the younger generation will never forget what happened, said Dr. Robert Krell, a survivor, president of the Vancouver Holocaust Centre Society.

Opening simultaneously with the centre is its first major exhibit, Anne Frank In The World, 1929-1945, a photo documentary from the Anne Frank Centre in Amsterdam. This exhibit, shown in Western Canada for the first time, runs to Dec. 11. Centre officials say many schools have booked field trips to the exhibit and there is a long waiting list.

At least eight municipalities proclaimed Nov. 7-14 as Anne Frank Week.

One of the founders of the Holocaust society, Krell said the Education Centre is meant to help counter the Holocaust deniers and to educate all citizens of the province about the Holocaust.

"It can serve as a warning to all faiths and racial groups that signs of anti-Semitism are a precursor to all racial hatred, which starts with anti-Semitism," Krell told the large audience at the opening.

The centre will hopefully serve to prevent race hatred in the future, he added. There are now three major Holocaust educational centres in Canada. The others are in Toronto and Montreal.

The Vancouver centre occupies 4,000 square feet in the newly reconstructed Jewish Community Centre, at 950 West 41st Ave.

A group of suvivors formed the society in 1985 and despite lack of facilities, they conducted an impressive educational program, especially among school children. Members speak to an average of 1,200 children a year — and last season spoke to over 5,000 kids, likely as a result of the popularity of Schindler's List.

The VHC says an education policy has been developed by a committee of teachers, using programs prepared by professional educators.

Exhibits planned by a committee of educators, historians, survivors and a professional museum designer will display artifacts, photographs, documents, video testimonies and interactive computer programs.

Computer terminals and modems are set up in the centre, allowing line access, via Internet, to various Holocaust data bases.

The VHC has permanent loan of a 144-year-old Torah, written in Smichov, a town near Prague where there are no Jews left. The Torah, rescued from the Nazis, will be kept in the commemorative area of the centre.

A highlight at the opening was an address by Dr. Yehuda Bauer, a Holocaust specialist from Hebrew University.

Greetings were brought from the federal government by Vancouver MP Anna Terrana and from the province by Vancouver MLA Bernie Simpson.

The Anne Frank exhibit was formally opened by Baron Marnix van Aerssen, the Netherlands consul general, who said, "The world must not forget in order to remember" the atrocities of the Hitler era. He paid tribute to the Vancouver Jewish community for establishing the Holocaust centre.

Cornelius Suijk, the international director of the Anne Frank Centre U.S.A., a survivor of a Nazi prison camp, also spoke. He said he began working with the Anne Frank House in Amsterdam at the request of Anne's father, Otto, the only survivor of their hide-out.

The Anne Frank exhibit here comprises 540 photos with texts, beginning in Frankfurt Am Main, in the 1920s, the Frank home for generations. Photos of the old city and the Jewish community are shown, along with social and political events which led to the demise of the community.

There are photos of the Frank family's hideout and the raid on it by German police.

Anne died of typhus in Bergen-Belsen in March 1945.

Unwelcome policy

The federal government is shifting the direction of its immigration policy. And there seems little doubt that the Reform Party is its lodestar.

Two weeks ago Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi announced proposals to change the government's rules on immigration. The chief components of the new policy are: a reduction in the number of immigrants to be admitted into the country next year; a greater emphasis on attracting "economic" immigrants; the stipulation that knowledge of English or French is "critical" for admission; a readjustment of the financial burden on bearing the costs of settling the new arrivals away from the tax-payer toward the immigrants themselves or immigrant agencies; an increase in the number of true refugees; and a crack-down on the abusers of the system.

To be sure, the proposals contain some aspects which are reasonable and praiseworthy, such as the intention to root out the malign and criminal elements within the system, or the decision to allow more true refugees into the country, or the attempt to strike a more equitable balance in funding the resettlement of immigrants.

But they also contain aspects which raise concerns; for example, the reduction in the number of family class immigrants, or the shrinking of the definition of family by removing from it parents and grandparents, or the emphasis on the importance of facility in either the French or English language. How can this preference for English or French speakers be reconciled meaningfully with the constitutional obligation to interpret the Charter of Rights and Freedoms "in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians"?

The trend in Western Europe has been for "tougher" immigration policies. It may even be showing traces in the results of the mid-term elections in the United States. We have seen politicians in Europe and in the United States pandering to negative public perceptions of immigrants, to reflexive xenophobic responses of an angry electorate and of a frequently alienated, nihilistic youth.

We hope the trend has not arrived on Canadian shores.

If the government's proposals are the beginning of a mean-spirited, less humanitarian immigration program, the country will ultimately be poorer. History has continually proven that family reunification of industrious new arrivals, the seekers and builders of a new and better world, leads both to social and economic strength.

We must befriend the stranger, for we too were strangers in the land of Egypt. (Deut. 10:19)

The implementation of the new policies will warrant close watching. The Jewish community understands this very well.

Auspicious event

The appointment of Montreal-born Bernard Shapiro as principal of McGill University is an auspicious event from many points of view.

In the last several years, McGill has been striving to reassert its leadership in the academic community.

Maclean's reports in its Nov. 14 issue that McGill is well on its way to achieving its goals. In the national survey, McGill was rated among the top three universities giving medical and doctoral degrees, and the Montreal institution scored highly in several other categories.

The appointment of Dr. Bernard Shapiro clearly shows that a new day has dawned at Quebec's premier anglophone university. It is a well known fact that McGill University did not always welcome Jewish students or faculty under its former quota system.

All this had changed: McGill University now has a Jewish principal and his induction to the office was accompanied by a benediction given by a Montreal rabbi.

In his acceptance speech, Shapiro stressed the need to expose students at McGill to the special élan that comes with an education in a city with diverse cultural, linguistic and intellectual values. The new principal also pointed to the need for maintaining excellence in the complex social and political climate of Quebec and Canada.

McGill University has chosen wisely in installing Shapiro as its chief academic officer. Quebec and the rest of Canada will ultimately be the benefactors of this choice.

Letters to the editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

COMMENT SHOCKS READER

I read with the utmost consternation the letter from Nathan Yacowar (CJN, Oct. 29) quoting with approval a rabbi who maintained that Prime Minister Rabin's contact with a Sepher Torah rendered the said Torah scroll "posul" (unusable).

Whatever one's political and religious sympathies and one's attitude to Mr. Rabin, the latter is the duly elected democratic leader of his party and prime minister of his country. That a rabbi should voice such a crudity is inexcusable and strays way beyond mere partisanship. That this comment should impress your correspondent and that The CJN should print such obscenity defies logic.

Permit me to conclude by stating that, if what irks Mr. Yacowar and the rabbi whom he quotes with such approval, is the fact that Mr. Rabin is a secularist Jew, both might reflect upon the contention of the late Rav Kook of blessed memory who, in response to religious Orthodoxy's criticism of the secularist pioneers of his own day, maintained that these so-called secularists were, in fact, religious souls who were to be compared to the workers who constructed King Solomon's temple.

LAUDS SAUDI ARABIA

I have always been quick to condemn Saudi Arabia for its hostility to the State of Israel in particular and to the Jewish people in general. It has consistently led the boycott banning trade with Israel and it has refused to do business with Jews or to allow Jews to even visit Saudi Arabia.

Now there are two hopeful signs. In one development a Saudi Arabian prince negotiated the purchase of an interest in the Four Seasons Hotel from its Jewish owners. On a larger scale the announcement that Saudi Arabia will lead the Gulf Co-operation Council and support the move within the Arab League to abolish a ban on direct trading with Israel must be universally applauded and I am happy to do so.

It is encouraging indeed to see one former enemy after another recognize the value of peace with Israel and welcome it into the community of Middle East Nations.

NOT CHOPPED LIVER

I have just read the article about Canadian Conservative Jews and the growing rift between them and American Conservative Jews. My reaction from out here in Winnipeg is: what are we, chopped liver?

I am the senior rabbi of Congregation Shaarey Zedek of Winnipeg, which was still in Canada the last time I checked. We are a congregation of 1200 families, and are fully egalitarian. Rosh Pina Congregation, also in Winnipeg, is a congregation of 700 families and is also fully egalitarian. The third congregation here is Beth Israel Congregation, which recently voted to move gradually towards being egalitarian.

I will grant you that I am an American citizen, as are the rabbis at the other two synagogues. But most of the rabbis in Toronto and Montreal are also Americans. I also know many Canadian rabbis happily serving egalitarian synagogues in the United States. And it was not so long ago that a woman was serving as the rabbi of a Conservative congregation in Halifax, which is also in Canada I am told.

I still find it amazing that something can be said about all of Canada when you are really talking just about Toronto and Montreal. I would have thought that the failure of Meech Lake would have taught you something.

I am now in my seventh year in Canada, and I have learned that many Canadians, particularly if they live in Toronto, like to find differences wherever they can between the United States (and American values) and Canada (and Canadian values). But American Conservative values and Canadian Conservative values? Give us a break!

Last I checked, the Conservative synagogue in New York where I grew up was non-egalitarian, as are many New York-area synagogues. Perhaps they think they are really in Canada. Perhaps Winnipeg is really in North Dakota or Minnesota.

There are serious arguments both for and against calling women to the Torah, counting them in a minyan, and ordaining them as rabbis. While there is no doubt that Toronto and Montreal have been strongholds of the anti-egalitarian position, I do not think many Conservative Jews in Winnipeg would appreciate the idea that they are somehow un-Canadian because of their stand on these issues.

Syria wants more than Golan Heights

By RABBI ROBERT L. WOLKOFF

There is hardly any idea about the Middle East more common than the proposition that nothing means more to Syria's Hafez al-Assad than regaining the Golan Heights. Peace between Israel and Syria would be impossible without complete Israeli withdrawal from that strategic plateau.

Thus one arrives at the simple equation: Complete withdrawal for complete peace.

This conclusion is a perfect example of the old maxim: For every complex problem, there is a simple solution. And it is always wrong — in this case because its fundamental premise is wrong.

Syria has not been fighting Israel to regain the Golan, a chunk of territory smaller than many U.S. counties. Syria has been fighting Israel in keeping with the existential principle that Israel should not exist. Peace will not be possible until that principle is abandoned. But if that principle is in the process of being abandoned, it is not because of any desperate Syrian need for the Golan.

There are things far more important to Assad than the Golan, and, on a hopeful note, Israel is in a position to deliver them.

• Water. It has been calculated that if Turkey, Syria and Iraq all execute their planned projects for the Euphrates river, they will be using 150 per cent of its waters within a decade.

There are only two alternatives: war or finding another source of water. Luckily, the technology is already available, and improving rapidly. Israel could agree to provide the water, the technology or even the money to supply Syria's increasingly desperate needs. The cost would be several billion dollars, the rough equivalent of the cost to Israel of one day of full-scale warfare.

A bargain, at nearly any price.

• Lebanon. Syria has never recognized Lebanese independence. While presently dominating Lebanon with over 40,000 troops, Syria's hold is still tenuous and could in the future come under severe international criticism. Israeli recognition of continued Syrian hegemony would stabilize a Middle East commercial centre. This would allow the establishment of a relationship between Syria and Lebanon roughly similar to that between China and Hong Kong.

A continual source of revenue for Syria's perennially shaky economy would outvalue the Golan by an incalculable amount.

• Iraq. The rivalry between Damascus and Baghdad is perhaps the oldest international rivalry in the Muslim world. It is exacerbated today by the presence of two Ba'ath party rival dictators, both vying for pride of place in the Middle East. Syria is at an enormous disadvantage in this struggle because it has no substantial oil wealth.

Peace with Israel would not just mean an improved Syrian economy. It could lead to an understanding that would see an incursion over the Iraqi border toward Syria as a threat to Israel, thus freeing enormous resources in Damascus for peaceful purposes.

• The United States. Assad knows that the United States is the only superpower, and the key to economic development. He also knows that the key to improved relations with the United States rests securely in Jerusalem. The U.S. administration would be overjoyed, and generous, if peace could be established without full Israeli withdrawal from the Golan.

The question of a large UN peace keeping force would thus be avoided. And every Pentagon study has shown that the Israeli military presence on the Golan stabilizes an otherwise precarious regional security situation.

• Power. Shoshana Bryen of the Jewish Institute for National Security Affairs has pointed out that nothing means more to Assad than staying in power. The Assad government is based on an overlapping army of secret services (which recently arrested 35 officers accused of plotting against the regime). Their existence would be threatened by the democratization full peace with Israel would entail. Thus, full peace would constitute a direct challenge to Assad's authority, just as, less dramatically, Palestinian contact with Israeli democracy has triggered protests against Yasser Arafat's autocratic methods.

These are the crucial issues for Syria. Any one of them could be parleyed against a moderate Israeli presence on the Golan.

This would of course mean that peace between Israel and Syria would be a "cool" peace, rather than a "warm" one. But the important thing about peace is not its temperature. It is, rather, the degree to which it satisfies needs on both sides. Retaining part of the Golan as a defensive buffer certainly satisfies an Israeli need. Keeping the peace "cool" addresses Syrian needs. Assad would be able to both keep his society under control and satisfy a deep-seated fear among Syrians of the consequences of full peace with Israel.

A more limited agreement between Syria and Israel than that between Israel and its other neighbors is admittedly lacking in glamor. It will not be a "perfect peace." But there's an old Jewish saying, "Perfection is an obsession." Sometimes, less-than-perfect is to be preferred.

Really different ways to mobilize a community

By GARY ROSENBLATT
New York Jewish Week

Item: A 12-year-old boy in Oshkosh, Wis., was arrested this week for painting a swastika on the wall of a local synagogue. End of item.

The above is fictitious. But if it were true, how would the Jewish community respond?

I submit that the leaders of our Jewish organizations, G-d love them, would commandeer their fax machines, and the results might look something like this...

• The Anti-Defamation League announced today the results of a new study, "Anti-Semitism in Rural Dairy Communities," which found that swastika-painting incidents have increased 17 per cent in the last 24 hours. At a press conference, ADL director Abe Foxman said he would personally like to "mix it up in a dark alley" with the youngster charged in the incident. Foxman decried the situation and called for legislation, community awareness and another study.

• The Simon Wiesenthal Centre announced today plans to hold a torchlit vigil, led by Elizabeth Taylor and the late Orson Welles in a fleet of limos, at the site in Oshkosh. Director Rabbi Marvin Hier said the program will be tasteful yet forceful, featuring a 27-monitor, laser-enhanced light show as well as the governor of Wisconsin and the Oshkosh High School marching band.

• The American Jewish Congress announced today a new travel tour of the Midwest, with special rates for members under 70. Highlights include a daylong tour of lovely Oshkosh and a visit to the local public school the 12-year-old boy attends in an effort to monitor the separation of church and state.

• The American Jewish Committee today announced a 10-year, long-range study to explore the root causes of anti-social behavior, focusing on intergroup relations between American Jews and non-Jews whose families came from Europe and Asia. As a result, scholars will convene next week in Berlin and Tokyo to probe the interconnectedness of racism and the use of paint.

• Rabbi Avi Weiss of the Coalition for Jewish Concerns/Amcha was arrested in Oshkosh today after chaining himself, in tallit and concentration camp uniform, to the owner of the hardware store that sold the paint to the youngster charged in the incident. Rabbi Weiss insisted that "Never again will we sit idly by while paint is spilled in communities where our brothers and sisters live."

• Americans For A Safe Israel published a monograph today revealing that the uncle of the 12-year-old charged in the Oshkosh incident was a member of the same bridge club as the cousin of a former member of Breira, the dovish Mideast peace group. An official of AFSI is planning to submit a major article to Commentary magazine on "The Oshkosh Conspiracy: The Threat To Israeli Security."

• Americans for Peace Now has scheduled a dialogue meeting with the boy charged in the Oshkosh incident. "We need to understand his pain and rage," said a spokesman, asserting that "only through face to face meetings and the dynamic of interactive personal discussion can the barriers of hatred and misunderstanding be resolved." An APN fundraising campaign has been launched to aid in the youngster's legal difficulties.

• Morton Klein of the Zionist Organization of America, after meeting individually with every member of Congress today, said he had singlehandedly drafted legislation that will launch a cooperative Farm Bill Initiative between Wisconsin and the Golan Heights.

• The American Israel Public Affairs Committee said today that Klein's legislation was foolhardy and unnecessary — and that AIPAC was doing it also.

• The National Council of Jewish Women today announced a program inspired by the harassed mother of the youngster charged in the Oshkosh incident, asserting that better day care provisions might have prevented the incident. Meanwhile, Hadassah offered to send the woman to Israel, where she could be treated for stress at Hadassah Hospital and made a life member of the organization.

• The Lubavitch movement announced today a youth effort to Bring Moshiach to Oshkosh. Brigades of mitzvah tanks will roll down the streets of the town, where citizens will be encouraged to light Sabbath candles, put on tefillin and check the mezuzot on silos and farmhouses throughout the area.

• Finally, the UJA-Federation today launched Operation Oshkosh, an emergency campaign to support the Jewish community of the troubled Wisconsin city which is suffering from social, spiritual and psychological trauma. Officials have appointed a subcommittee to report to a larger spending committee that will oversee the expenditure of the Process Committee in the $35-million effort to provide such basics as milk, cookies, and Jewish continuity and identity.

A trip to Berlin: closing the circle

Some months ago I shared with you an experience which recounted my coming across a little sheet of paper. Its date was July 25, 1934; it was an announcement of my defence of certain legal theses, which was to be held on that very day. The public testing was judged successful and I was awarded the degree of Doctor Iuris Utriusque. Seeing this memento of days gone by so very close to the actual 60th anniversary of the event seemed coincidence enough. But more was to come.

Some weeks thereafter I received a letter from the president of Humboldt University in Berlin, inviting me to deliver the convocation address and to welcome new students to the university system. (German universities are essentially graduate institutions.) The letter not only invited me to give this lecture, but at the same time to receive a special document commemorating the 60th anniversary of receiving my degree at that very school.

It did not take me long to accept the invitation, for it represented the closing of a circle that had been uncompleted. For the university, in its own slow and plodding way, had, back in 1934, done something that few other universities still had the courage to do: award a Jew the degree even though the Nazis had been in power for a year and a half. I was one of the last to be accepted.

Though Jews in Germany were already leading a restricted existence and had been excluded from the legal profession, the willingness of the university to hold out against the pressures of a brutal and totalitarian government was noteworthy. In fact, the university was then still employing Jewish professors, while in most other places they had been dismissed. In pre-Hitler days, Humboldt University had been a star amongst the many distinguished scientific and humanistic institutions of the country. By 1933 it counted 28 Nobel prize winners on its faculty.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Located at the east end of Berlin's most beautiful boulevard, Unter den Linden, the university had become, after World War II, part of the German Democratic Republic (GDR), part of the Soviet bloc. Five years ago this November, the wall that had isolated East Berlin was breached, and since then, East and West have become one.

The unification is not without its problems, but that is another subject. One thing is evident: the East is rebuilding; cranes are to be seen everywhere. The city is bustling and trying to rouse itself from its former stupor.

Among its new landmarks is, significantly, Berlin's old premier synagogue, referred to by its location, Oranienburger Strasse, where, in the 20s and 30s Rabbi Leo Baeck was the major preacher. Burnt out on Pogrom Night (Kristrallnacht), it was entirely demolished during the war. Now its facade has been restructured and its golden cupola put in place. The interior is still empty, but groups of visitors stand around regularly to admire the facade and the dome that crowns it. Gold glimmers in the evening light and can be seen from miles around. It is a strange thing to see Berlin now taking pride in its Jewish past.

Unfortunately, the present is nothing much to write about. The elected chair of the community, a native of Warsaw, is Jerzy Kanal, a retired businessman. He is not sure that a vigorous and committed community can be rebuilt. But he and his colleagues are trying — with schools and camps and sparse rabbinic personnel. For it is hard to find rabbis for Berlin (or Germany) who can speak the language adequately and are willing to take on this kind of community.

Outside the building, one sees the protective police with cruiser van, personnel with machine pistols, and another policeman patrolling the other side of the street. But that sight is not unique to Berlin or to Germany. It is found in many other European countries as well.

My talk (on the problem of refugees and immigration) found a receptive audience. The ceremonies were simple but memorable. Among the many people I met was a member of the university's theological faculty. I was surprised when, upon entering his book-lined study, I found significant numbers of Hebrew volumes, dictionaries and reference books (amongst them the Steinsalz Talmud), and even my own Torah commentary. The books were not just show — they reflected the scholarship of a warm, pleasant and very serious person. He gave me one of his latest books, entitled Catechism and Siddur, which I read on the way back. I was much impressed. This kind of man represents the best of the new Germany, which despite recent radical excesses, is a vibrant democracy that signifies a new chapter in its checkered history.

When life gives you lemons — make lemonade

Entrepreneurship hit the kids in our neighborhood yesterday and I hope they learned something from it, because I did. I learned that sponsoring capitalism for the members of an underdeveloped, unskilled society with an anarchistic government is expensive, time consuming and thankless.

In other words, I didn't learn anythinng the UN and the World Bank couldn't have taught me.

By Erica Meyer Ruzan

It began innocently enough with my 8-year-old daughter and her friend. "We're going to sell lemonade, Mom," my daughter said.

"Great," I said, not paying nearly as much attention as I should have been. It was a typical South Florida fall day. No one except a Floridian would have defined it as autumn, but those of us who had been hot since April could feel just enough fresh coolness in the air to know the season had shifted. The breeze brought everyone outdoors. The kids' business timing was fine; however, their supply side was a problem. I was it.

The next thing I knew, my entire kitchen, pantry, back closet and front yard were in jeopardy. Little people were rummaging about, confiscating resources.

"What do you guys need?" I asked my daughter, with what I thought was an admirable amount of calm self-control. I tried to add in just the right dollop of nurturing encouragement leavened with a note or two of parental cautionary restraint.

"Not much," she said, with a straight face. "We got the lemonade powder from the kitchen already. Now we need some boxes, some signs, some ice, some pitchers, and some cups."

I took a deep breath. The extent of this exercise was beginning to dawn on me. Already a management team of two 8-year-olds had turned into a squad including my 11-year-old daughter; her buddy, also 11; my 4-year-old son; the 9-year-old and the 6-year-old from next door (to the right), and the 8-year-old and 5-year-old from next door (to the left). Some were tall, some were short, some were on roller skates in my living room.

"You are on your own for boxes and signs," I said. "Look outside for boxes. See if you can use the back of a school poster for a sign. I'll get you pitchers and cups. Help yourselves to ice out of the fridge."

Somehow, in the act of handing over two plastic pitchers, two picnic-size thermos bottles and a stack of paper cups, I lost any control I might have exercised over this project. I did manage to rescue my Sabbath challah cloth from duty as a box cover but only by substituting a pillow case I used to really like.

In no time, the country's newest fast food franchise was operating in front of our house. It began as two cardboard boxes and, in the course of the afternoon, expanded to tent city proportions: four kiddy-size chairs, a canopy made out of sheets, signs facing both north and south, a play-pen for the littlest neighborhood participants, a phalanx of bicycles, and a cash box rattling with coins. We rapidly ran out of lemonade and the kids switched to dark red, instant raspberry ice tea. It was a much bigger seller and a much brighter color; instead of just dampening anything it spilled on, it stained nicely. The label on the box said tea but the sweet, red beverage the children produced looked and tasted like the stuff we use to get at summer camp, where we called it "bug juice."

The first thing it spilled on was my 4-year-old who didn't mind at all. He decided to rinse his shirt in the nearest mud puddle and stayed there all day, splashing around and drinking cups of tea brought to him by his sisters, as happy as any silent partner — the equivalent of the guy who plays golf and collects dividends.

As the upstart business grew, the adults in the neighborhood couldn't have been nicer. (And why not? It wasn't their yard, their wordly goods or their stained pillowcase — it was only their kids.) All the moms and dads bought red tea. The man who lives across the street bought it, and drove off with it. We didn't see him drink it, but since his family owns one of the best restaurants in town, I fear it wasn't up to his usual standards. The nice doctor and his wife from up the street not only purchased it, but consumed it as well, a step clearly above and beyond neighborly duty.

By 5 p.m., the sweaty entrepreneurs divvied about $10 between them, clearing enough each to feel that the day's labor had been worthwhile. I was out of cups, tea, and patience, but I felt okay about it. My children were happy and occupied all day; my husband had persuaded them to bring everything back indoors; and I managed to survive the entire experience without ever having to actually drink anything. I could handle the cost, the lack of control, and the manic burst of infant capitalism, but I just wasn't ready for bug juice.

The many faces of Israel

By CARL ALPERT

The real, every day Israel is to be found not in the headlines but in the colorful and unusual items which are usually buried on the back pages. In recent weeks, for example:

The Cultural Tradition. Margalit Yosef, wife of Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, always used to advise children who came on visits with their families: "If you want to be important, like the Rav, ask your parents to buy you books instead of toys."

The Dollar's Woes. It may not have been original, but the daily Yediot attracted attention when it headlined an article about the drop in the dollar's value in international markets: Via Dollar-osa.

Just a Little Patience. Israelis who are disturbed by the shrieking of burglar alarms which have been set off accidentally on parked cars, usually at night, sometimes call the police to put an end to the nuisance. They are advised that they may file suit against the offending car owner, but only 60 days after the offense has been reported.

Justice in the Army. A soldier in the Israel armed forces complained that his commanding officer had unjustly confined him to post for 28 days. Investigation confirmed his complaint, and the soldier was given a vacation by way of compensation.

Our Neighbors. Twelve-year-old Ali al-Jaffri had a party at his home in Amman, Jordan, when his father announced his official engagement to his cousin, Maryam, age 11. The groom-to-be has quit school and has taken a job to earn money to support the future bride. The wedding ceremony will take place in three years.

Keep an Eye on the Beard. A Jordanian newspaper notes that King Hussein has grown a beard three times in his lifetime. Each time it indicated that he was under heavy external pressure. First was during the signing of the Camp David agreement between Egypt and Israel. The second time was during the Gulf War, and then, more recently, in the wake of the signing of the Israel-PLO agreement. If his beard comes off now, that would be evidence that he is comfortable in his new relations with Israel.

Looking for Bargains. A new Arab company called the Palestinian Corp. for Investment and Development is seeking to raise $200 million. They are interested in buying complete Jewish settlements when the Israel government decides to sell.

Surprise! Surprise! The robbers planned the bank robbery extremely well, but when they emerged from the bank, laden with bags of money, they discovered to their consternation that the get-away car, which they had left nearby, had disappeared. Because it was in a no-parking zone, the police had towed it away, unaware of what was going on inside the bank. The robbers escaped on foot.

Knesset, Seat of Judgment. By unanimous vote, the Knesset approved a law requiring that for every toilet seat installed in the men's section of public toilets, there must be two in the women's section. The legislation was initiated by MK Dalia Itsik.

Racist recruiter recants

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Elisse Hategan has switched sides. Formerly an ardent neo-Nazi racist, white supremacist and anti-Semite, Hategan today is a champion of racial tolerance and multiculturalism.

"I'm not the same person I was," she said, barely able to believe she once called for the extermination of non-whites, and beat up a homosexual.

Hategan, 19, was a member of the neo-Nazi Heritage Front in Toronto for about two years. Indeed, she was one of its top recruiters. She joined in 1991 and defected in 1993 to its nemesis, the Canadian Centre on Racism and Prejudice.

Since then, Hategan — the product of what appears to be a dysfunctional Romanian family — has testified in federal court against three of her former associates, Wolfgang Droege, Gary Schipper and Ken Barker, and used her public speaking skills to denounce the Heritage Front and other groups in Canada which sow racial hatred and divisiveness.

Nowadays, Hategan lives and works with precisely the sort of people she once despised — Jews, blacks, Asians, gays, lesbians and leftists.

And though she feels that a burden has been lifted from her shoulders since her break with the Heritage Front, Hategan remains vigilant, realizing that her former neo-Nazi pals seek vengeance.

"I won't be intimidated by them," she said defiantly in an interview in a crowded midtown cafe. While Hategan is not as afraid of retribution as she was a year ago, she is still basically in hiding and careful of her movements.

"I wouldn't go to certain places, and I look over my shoulder. I'm sure they [the Heritage Front] see me as a threat."

In their eyes, Hategan is not only a "race traitor," but an arch turncoat. Partly on the basis of her testimony as a crown witness for the Canadian Human Rights Commission last June, three leaders of the Heritage Front were sent to prison.

Never in her wildest dreams could she have conceived such a scenario. In her prime as a professional racist, Hategan — a petite brunette who was clad in a short dark skirt, black leotards and black combat boots for the interview — assumed that the Heritage Front would be her spiritual home for life.

An only child, Hategan was born in Bucharest, where, she said, she was "perfectly happy." Hategan is purposely vague about her past, but she lets some information slip out.

Her parents immigrated to Canada seven years ago, and the Hategans lived in a rough Toronto neighborhood. Her father, an art teacher who has since died, was unhappy in Canada and returned to Romania in 1987. She lived with her mother, who is of partial German origin. They did not get along well.

Explaining her parents' views, she observed: "A lot of Romanians have certain anti-Semitic feelings. My father was against what Hitler did [to Jews]. But sometimes, he expressed anti-Semitic attitudes — like saying all Jews are rich and selfish."

She insists that she did not develop anti-Semitic attitudes until she committed herself to the Heritage Front, but admits that she disliked blacks and Asians.

At 14, having dropped out of school, she ran away from home and lived in a group home. Asked to explain her flight, she declined to discuss this episode.

She claims she heard about the Heritage Front through the Church of the Creator, a vehemently racist outfit. She called the Heritage Front's hot line and left a message. At the time, she had no friends, goals or ideals. She was a lonely, alienated teenager.

Wolfgang Droege, the leader of the Heritage Front, answered her call. He offered her a sense of belonging and self-esteem that had always eluded her. "He made me feel I was the greatest person... Basically, he empowered me."

Hategan adopted their twisted values. "I knew I wanted to be involved in the race war that was coming up ahead, and that I wanted to kill as many non-whites as possible, so that in the end, you know, the white race would survive."

Due to her speaking abilities, Hategan became a featured speaker at many Heritage Front meetings. She was also an able recruiter, preying on young, lost souls like herself.

By her estimate, two-thirds of her recruits were between the ages of 17-27, from predominantly middle-class, conservative suburban homes. The Heritage Front, she noted, was particularly eager to recruit senior citizens "for their money."

The majority of recruits were of Anglo/Irish/Scottish descent, with a sprinkling of ethnic Italians and Greeks, who, Hategan said, were somewhat looked down upon. As she put it, "The Heritage Front doesn't respect southern Europeans. They are not seen as white people."

As a Heritage Front acolyte, Hategan was reprogrammed, bombarded with a plethora of anti-Jewish propaganda material — books, pamphlets and films [including The Eternal Jew, a notorious Nazi documentary-cum-rant.] Among her teachers were Droege and Ernst Zundel, the convicted Holocaust denier and neo-Nazi publisher.

Being ignorant, impressionable and vulnerable, Hategan lapped it all up. However, she now claims, she never bought into the ZOG theme — the outlandish claim that the United States is a "Zionist Occupied Government."

According to Hategan, the Heritage Front tries to fudge its hatred and contempt of minorities with the transparent claim that it is only trying to protect the interests of whites.

But, in fact, it hews to an extremist plank that would deprive all non-whites and Jews of their rights and eventually push them out of Canada.

Hategan left the Heritage Front for a variety of reasons. She rebelled at its suggestion that she dress sexier to attract recruits. She was upset by being ostracized from discussions because she was a woman. She recoiled from becoming involved in a harassment campaign against female anti-racists.

She broke with the Heritage Front when she warned an anti-racism worker about one of its impending harassment campaigns. The police arrested her, charging Hategan with libel. Having reached her nadir, she tried to commit suicide.

Hategan contacted Martin Theriault, the executive director of the Canadian Centre on Racism and Prejudice. Understandably, he was initially skeptical. "We don't take ex-Nazis at face value. We thought she was a plant. We really grilled her. We doubled checked and triple checked her information."

Having turned her back on the Heritage Front, Hategan spied on it for several months before she formally left the organization. "She was good as a mole," Theriault said.

Theriault, who describes her as "a very sweet 19-year-old," said that Hategan is an important asset because she is a former insider who knows the truth — the whole truth — about the Heritage Front. Since her defection, she has addressed anti-racism forums and been interviewed by Vision TV and CBC TV. And Theriault is counting on her insider's knowledge to nail still more racists.

"She can do a lot to get these guys behind bars and go after Zundel's operation," he observed.

According to Theriault, Hategan's "security problems" are not as serious today as they were immediately after her defection. "But you never know..." he said, a note of caution in his voice.

Taking no chances, Hategan lives outside Toronto, "moving around, trying not to settle into a pattern."

Hategan has abandoned her former ideas and embraced the concept of brotherhood. "I am not a racist, nor an anti-Semite."

She no longer believes the Holocaust is a hoax, and is eager to immerse herself in data which convey an objective account of the Final Solution. As well, she wants to meet Jews who can educate her more about Jewish culture, history and religion.

Hategan, however, continues to be plagued by residual racism. "Sometimes," she confessed, "I might have a one-second stereotypical racist reaction to something. I realize I'm wrong and I stop."

Jewish World

By Sheldon Kirshner

Tuvia Bielski is an heroic figure from the Holocaust who saved more than 1,200 Jews. A Jew himself, he was the organizer of a Jewish forest community-cum-partisan detachment in western Belorussia which sheltered Jews who might otherwise have perished at the hands of the Nazis.

In the aftermath of the war, Bielski faded into obscurity and was all but forgotten. However, thanks to Nechama Tec, a sociologist at the University of Connecticut who interviewed Bielski weeks before his death in 1987, Bielski's story is told in Defiance: The Bielski Partisans (Oxford University Press, $27.50). Regrettably, this is not a first-rate work, but it's the only account of its kind and, thus, bears reading.

Bielski was born in 1906 in the isolated village of Stankiewicze, a backward place without running water or electricity. He was one of 12 children sired by David and Beila Bielski, who owned a mill, farmed the land and kept horses, cows, geese and chickens.

Following the German invasion of 1941, news of Nazi massacres of Jews in nearby villages reached the Bielskis. Tuvia Bielski's parents, as well as his first wife, were rounded up, transported to a neighboring town and eventually murdered. He and his two brothers, Zus and Asael, eluded the Nazi dragnet, and as they mourned their loss, they resolved that they would not meet a similar fate.

Heroic figure

Fleeing deep into the dense forests of the region, Tuvia and his brothers set up a camp which welcomed Jewish escapees with open arms. Tec describes it as "the largest armed rescue of Jews by Jews in World War II."

In the last quarter of 1942, the Bielski partisans joined the Soviet bands in joint military attacks against the German army. Bielsksi was under pressure to cooperate. A refusal could have endangered the very existence of the Bielski camp. Tec says that Soviet partisans would not have tolerated an unwillingness to fight, especially from Jews whom they suspected of cowardice.

Apart from partisan warfare, Bielski hunted down Nazi collaborators. Entire Belorussian families suspected of collaboration were eliminated. As a result, peasants who might have betrayed Jews to the Germans remained silent.

The Nazis put a price on Bielski's head, offering a substantial reward for information leading to his arrest. The tactic backfired, instilling among the peasantry still more fear of, and respect for, Bielski and company.

As a partisan, Bielski was a charismatic leader who was widely admired. But after the war, in Israel, his aura faded. He became an ordinary taxi driver, albeit with a fine, steady income. Given his wartime record, he could have been a political leader, Tec writes. But for reasons which remain unexplained, Bielski did not take advantage of his status.

After one of his brothers emigrated to the United States, Bielski and his family followed. In America, they had an older brother, a wealthy factory owner who had left Belorussia in the 1920s.

When Bielski died at the age of 81, he was a disillusioned man. Nothing, it seemed, could match the exhilaration of his experiences during the war.

Rabbinical Reflections

By RABBI CHANANYA M. BERZON

There is a familiar rabbinic adage: Ma'aseh Avot Siman L'Banim. The behavior of the ancestors reappears in the deeds of the descendants.

The actions, trials and tribulations of our patriarchs relate to the experience of the Jews throughout the ages. The most fundamental and elementary lesson one can derive from the Book of Genesis parallels that which will most likely be encountered by our people throughout the millenia.

Rabbis and laymen equally enjoy and at times feel compelled to use the biblical narrative as their crystal ball. Although it seems Calvinistic, Jewish tradition allows and even encourages predictions culled from actions of our forefathers.

A more subtle and religiously palatable application of this rabbinic dictum confines itself to the sphere of human behavior. The righteous deeds of our forefathers (Ma'aseh Avot) prescribes our emulation (Simon L'Banim).

We can grow as individuals and as a nation, according to the guidelines mapped out by the Holy Bible. If we encounter similar situations to those of the patriarchs, we can determine what mode of behavior the Almighty expects of us.

The first Jew we meet in Genesis is Abraham. The episodes of his life explain the term Chesed L'Avraham. We see how the originator of our genealogy, the noble Abraham, unflinchingly seeks to help the stranger, protect the underdog and diligently observe kindness and charity.

One could simply state that the Jew was, from day one, a caring creature. It is so engrained in our character that we might be moved to postulate that it is part of our genes — not nurture but nature.

However, much to our chagrin, even after so many noble and kind deeds, G-d does not indulge Abraham with an easy life. Although Abraham has reached the zenith of human kindness, G-d continues unrelentlessly to challenge his faith.

Finally, our forefather is commanded to sacrifice his son Isaac. Upon perusal of this mammoth requisite, we are shocked and dismayed. What a disappointment!

Our ancestor was tormented. He attempted to teach the world that there exists an Omnipotent Power who is loving and caring. Therefore, man too must love and care. This was the credo of his lifestyle. Here, the Almighty is destroying all that the patriarch practised and preached.

Is this not Ma'aseh Avot Siman L'Banim? Is there a people that is as charitable as the sons of Abraham?

And yet throughout history none have been so tormented and tortured as the Jew. G-d had tested Abraham. However, with his descendants He has gone much further. What our progenitor feared, we felt and fulfilled throughout time. We DID have our sons slaughtered. The angel DID NOT save us at the last moment.

The Midrash Rabbat (parshah A:50) to Lamentations describes in detail the story of Hannah and her seven sons. The youngest child is about to be killed like his older brothers because of his refusal to bow down to the idol. His mother falls upon the child, hugs and kisses him. And she says to him: "My son, go to Abraham your father and say to him, thus says your mother, 'Don't be proud of yourself saying you built an altar and placed Isaac upon it. Our mother built seven altars and placed seven children upon them in the very same day. You were just being tested but I carried it out.' " (See also TB Gittin 57.)

The question begs to be answered. Why? What have we done? Wherein were we guilty? This question cannot give us peace. We cannot avoid the absurdity of our fate. There is no answer that is humanly comprehensible.

In studying the Akedah, the sacrifice of Isaac, one should be overwhelmed by Abraham's muteness. Abraham never hesitated in confronting the Almighty in the past. Here, after the entire episode, when he finally has removed Isaac from the altar and is planning his return trip, Abraham should have turned to the Almighty and asked "Why G-d? Explain your actions! Is this going to be the microcosm of my children throughout the ages?"

Yet Abraham returns home, silent. All he can do is persist in living a life of chesed. He hopes that G-d will not find it necessary anymore to test his faith.

We, the proud heirs of such a noble stock, must emulate the ways of our patriarchs. We must be true to Abraham's career of chesed. Hopefully, soon in our days, may we be blessed with no more tests, so that no more will anyone lay their hands upon our lads nor do anything to harm them.

May we too hear the voice of the L-rd from heaven. (Genesis 22:17, 18) "That I will greatly bless you and I will greatly multiply your seed like the stars in heaven and the sand on the seashore, and your descendants will possess the gates of his enemies. And through your offspring will be blessed all the nations of the earth, because you have hearkened to My voice."

Rabbi Chananya Berzon is the spiritual leader of Young Israel of Chomedey in Montreal.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

ARBUS

Sidney Caplan writes that his friend Dr. Gerald Arbus attributes his surname to the Russian word for chick peas or watermelon.

Arbes is Yiddish for peas. The Slavic word is groch.

Arbuz is the Russian word for watermelon.

I vote for peas as an ingredient in the vegetable salad consisting of: Burak — beet; Linsen — lentil; Kerbel — corn; Zwiebel — onion.

Religious fundamentalism seen threat to world Jewry

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Religious Fundamentalism in the Middle East and the possibility of a violent outbreak of anti-Semitism in the former Soviet republics are the principal dangers facing world Jewry, said Dr. Yehuda Bauer, in an interview with The CJN.

Bauer is a professor of Holocaust Studies at the Institute of Contemporary Jewry and chair of the Centre for the Study of Anti-Semitism at Hebrew University.

In Victoria under the auspices of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU), Bauer opened Holocaust Memorial Week with a speech at Congregation Emanu-El, went on to Vancouver for the official opening of the Vancouver Holocaust Centre, and spoke at a public lecture sponsored by the CHFU at Congregation Beth Israel.

Fundamentalism has exploded in the Middle East, he said, because of horrible economic conditions, with few natural resources to boost the economy.

Fundamentalism is "terribly dangerous," Bauer said. "Jews are targets because we're Jews and there's a long tradition in the Muslim world of European-type anti-Semitism." Fundamentalists also see the West as a corrupting influence against Muslims.

Western powers must try to improve the economic health and employment situation instead of sending billions of dollars worth of arms to Muslim nations, he said.

And countries where fundamentalist activities are marginal must be watched closely, because "Such countries can become non-marginal if they aren't watched."

In the former Soviet states, 1.5 million Jews are in danger because anti-Semitism lurks just beneath the surface, Bauer said. Economic and social conditions are so bad that ultimately they will be turned against the Jews.

However, he said, maybe the reason anti-Semitism is being kept under wraps at this time is because people do want jobs and food.

Referring to the Holocaust and Holocaust denial, Bauer said the subject of the Holocaust has captured the imagination of many non-Jews who wonder if it could happen some day to them.

The uniqueness of the Holocaust is that never before had people been killed just for being born. And it was not only Nazis who killed, he emphasized. It was ordinary people — "like you and me."

He branded Holocaust deniers as liars, and pointed to David Irving (who was arrested in Victoria and eventually thrown out of Canada) as one of the main liars, for trying to prove that "only a million Jews perished in the Holocaust, not six million."

Those who believe in Holocaust denial are Nazis, not neo-Nazis, Bauer declared. They want to deify Hitler. Nazi ideology proclaims that Nazis were meant to rule the world but were prevented by the Jews.

Bauer told The CJN the research done through his centre has not found any concrete reason for anti-Semitism. It is not necessarily connected with economics or political crises. Their theory is that it's a "cultural malaise" which breaks out against Jews from time to time.

Theological anti-Semitism has waned, he said. Catholics and liberal Protestants "are now allies," he said. Anti-Semitism is a cardinal sin and Jews are regarded as "the older brother."

Bauer said the most important job is to prevent the younger generation from being poisoned by the anti-Semitism of the past.

TM — the key to Mideast peace?

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Will 7,000 Israelis practising transcendental meditation in the same place bring peace to the Middle East?

Yes, says a new group promoting the form of meditation also known as "yogic flying" because some enthusiasts believe they levitate.

A spokesman for the Israel Capital of One Government for One World Foundation, based in New Jersey, says $4 million has already been pledged to construct housing for a transcendental meditation (TM) town of 7,000, probably near the Sea of Galilee.

"More than 100 families in Israel are ready to move in," said Stephen Wolfe.

The Foundation is headed by philanthropist Mishe Feldman, honorary chair of Karen Hayesod of Mexico, and his son, Benjamin.

The two placed large ads in the Jerusalem Post and the Jerusalem Report asking for $25,000 pledges, the amount for one housing unit.

One of its Canadian supporters, Rabbi Allen Green of the Conservative Beth Israel synagogue in Winnipeg, told The CJN he would seriously consider moving to the TM town in Israel with his wife and three children. He has been practicing TM since 1971.

Rabbi Green said there is solid scientific evidence that TM can work to end violence in the area.

The figure of 7,000 represents the square root of one per cent of the world's population, the group says.

A psychology lecturer at York University, Israeli-born Tifrih Warren said Israel is the ideal place for the project because of the large number of TM enthusiasts in its diverse population and the large number of dedicated Zionists who would join in.

Two other Toronto supporters, 40-year-old marketing consultant David Gordon and Ron Robins, 45, who teaches TM to corporate executives, both say they would consider moving to Israel.

Change seen necessary for traditions to survive

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jewish traditions are not immutable and may change; "even Orthodox Jews are aware of this, though they tend to deny it," says Rabbi Wayne Allen, spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah Synagogue of Willowdale.

Participating in a panel discussion on Tradition And/Or Change Within Canadian Conservative Judaism, Rabbi Allen noted that chassidic Jews have made a change in the traditional blessing of the Sabbath candles.

"Traditions must change," he said, and quoted the British author G.K. Chesterton: "If you leave a thing alone, you leave it to a torrent of changes ... In other words, traditions must be renewed in order to be retained."

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl

A congregation that says it is a traditional egalitarian synagogue is making a misleading claim, he said. "Egalitarianism is not traditional, and unless we're prepared to be linguistically fuzzy or purposely deceptive, the phrase 'traditional egalitarian synagogue' is an oxymoron.

The panel discussion, which took place as part of the All Canadian Biennial Conference for Conservative Jewry, was moderated by Rabbi Erwin Schild, rabbi emeritus of the Adath Israel Congregation, and featured one other panelist, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

Our definition of what constitutes Torah reflects a "profound ambiguity," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl noted. "The tradition itself defines what is Torah, what is the word of God, and it includes some books and excludes others. Torah, the revelation of God, depends on the human interpretation of it, at its very essence. We are ... partners with God, and the partnership extends even to defining what is the essence of Torah."

As well, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl noted, our interpretation of Torah is essential to our understanding of it. "Torah is not self-explicating. You can't read it and understand it without interpretation.

"That's a very important idea. In order to understand God's word, we need human involvement. So what we deem to be authoritative is both revealed and interpreted."

Tradition, said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, "depends on God for its authority, yet it depends on us for its transmission."

Jewish law, he said, "is not so rigid — it does have some flexibility. And that is determined, to a great extent, by the great rabbis, in a dialectic, I would say, with their communities."

According to Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, Conservative Jews in Canada are less liberal than their South American counterparts, but less traditional than their equivalents in Britain. "We should not see ourselves in radical discontinuity with any of them ... It is not just Torah from Sinai — we in this room are partners in that process and in that partnership we too will help define what is tradition."

Following Rabbi Frydman-Kohl's presentation, eight other rabbis and lay persons participated in an open "town hall" discussion. They were: Rabbi Martin Berman, Dr. Beryl Chernick, Rabbi Mitchell Cohen, Mr. Sol Kaplinski, Rabbi Morton Leifman, Mr. Richard Moline, Mrs. Shirley Vernon and Rabbi Joseph Wernik.

Lessons of Holocaust being ignored today

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Most of the world's population doesn't even know the Holocaust ever happened, said Christopher Amerasinghe, senior general counsel of the Department of Justice.

In a talk entitled Have the Lessons of the Holocaust been Forgotten? delivered as part of Holocaust Education Week, Amerasinghe, who is responsible for bringing war criminals living in Canada to justice, noted that most Jews know about the Holocaust because it is their history. He said some Christians know of it to a lesser degree, although the topic is rarely discussed in church sermons or public schools.

"Jews and Christians represent less than one-quarter of the world's population," he said. "How many Asians and other peoples know what the Holocaust was? I don't think too many do. It's very much a European event and it's already being forgotten."

After the Holocaust, Amerasinghe said, the world powers resolved at Nuremberg "never again to permit a nation, government or group of persons to violate the laws of humanity by committing genocide, whether the victims are their own people or not."

He described the Holocaust as an unprecented historical event, then cited examples of post-war genocidal atrocities, to demonstrate that its impact has been obliterated in the rush of history.

The Western powers have shown themselves unwilling to launch a ground war to counter the "ethnic cleansing" campaign in Bosnia, he said. He likened the Serbian army to a hypothetical army of Nazis that, instead of invading Poland, merely persecuted the Jews.

"Would the Western powers have intervened? I doubt it. They were not their brothers' keepers. During World War II, France and England intervened only because they knew they were next on Hitler's list."

Regarding the civil war in the former Yugoslavia, Amerasinghe said, "The record of the Western powers is disgraceful and, in my view, utterly untenable . . . I know some of the details, and the horror of it is no less than the horrors of the Holocaust as perpetrated by the Nazis. It's strange that the world tolerates something like that and does nothing to stop it."

In the 1970s, the brutal Khmer Rouge regime of Cambodia wiped out some three million of that country's intelligentsia and enslaved many more in a campaign of genocide that was politically, not racially, motivated, Amerasinghe said.

"What did the Western powers and the rest of the civilized world do? Absolutely nothing. Cambodia was of no interest to them."

Amerasinghe compared this inaction with the "alacrity" of UN reaction when Iraq invaded Kuwait, thereby threatening the West's supply of oil. Although the allied powers chased Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait, they did not pursue him to Baghdad.

So far, Saddam has gone unpunished for war crimes committed against the Kurds of northern Iraq, Amerasinghe noted.

"Outwardly, the world may appear to be a safer place to live in than it was from 1939 to 1945. Actually, I doubt that it is," he said.

Most people who have not been victimized do not really understand what it means to be a victim, he said. "Forgetfulness is easy . . . Most victims want to forget, they don't want to remember their victimization, and rightly so. They don't want to live with it.

Amerasinghe spoke at the invitation of the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation of Canada.

Minors' lecture proves upsetting

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yuriel Priwes still remembers a jarring event from his early childhood growing up in British-controlled Palestine.

It was the middle of World War II when his father sat him down and explained there was a good chance their lives would change. German forces had just entered neighboring Egypt and they might be in Eretz Yisrael soon, his father said. There was the possibility that he and Yuriel's mother would "disappear."

"It was very traumatic. I realized that something terrible was happening and it has stayed with me," Priwes recalled recently.

Later, he learned that dozens of his relatives in Warsaw and Lodz had been murdered by the Nazis. It was only good fortune and a commitment to Zionism that had led his family to Palestine in 1935, avoiding the Nazi onslaught.

So when Priwes attended a two-day seminar on anti-racism and heard lecturer Arnold Minors explain that racism only targets people of color and Native Canadians, he was more than a little upset.

Crown attorneys

Priwes, one of about 20 Crown attorneys who attended the seminars Oct. 3-4, said he challenged Minors on that statement, asking him if what happened to the Jews under Hitler would fall within his definition of racism. Priwes said Minors' response was that it was not racism.

"I was very, very upset," Priwes said.

After a lunch break, Minors explained that what the Nazis did to the Jews was based on Jews being a cultural group, not a racial one, Priwes said. "He wasn't trying to pick a fight with me, but he wasn't budging on his definition of racism.

"To make what happened to Jews as not racist or a private business between one white people and another, I wasn't prepared to live with that," he said.

Minors has subsequently stated that he believes the Holocaust was a racist act.

Priwes said that "in one way, I'm pleased that Minors now realizes how wrong he was. But, I'm also angry. If he holds certain views. . . to pretend he did not say that is less than mature.

"I feel that if a person is going to teach me about racism, [he should acknowledge] that not only his ethnic group is a victim of racism."

Ontario Premier Bob Rae has ordered an investigation into Minors' comments.

MS support program founder Perla Arditti. [Jay Brodbar photo]

MS group grows at BJC

TORONTO — The Bathurst Jewish Centre support program for people with Multiple Sclerosis (MS) has grown from 30 participants to about 50 in only a couple of months.

Multiple Sclerosis is a chronic, progressive nerve disease that can severely disable sufferers.

The program includes exercise and yoga classes, swimming, counselling and the use of special equipment.

"There is nothing else like this under one roof," noted Perla Arditti, an MS sufferer who not only initiated the program but found the funds to get it started and keep it going.

The myoflex machines used "increase the functional capacity of muscles affected by MS," according to kinesiologist Roland Spiegel, who works with the group.

Patches which provide electrical stimulation are placed on parts of the body especially affected.

"The muscles that have already atrophied get going again," said Arditti. Those using the equipment will notice a difference and "may be able to stand on their feet longer."

Arditti's goal is for at least 100 people to benefit from these activities. "I also hope to bring in expert speakers and offer services for the families of MS victims," she said.

That would mean a five day a week operation rather than three, and acquiring additional equipment which, she insists, would not pose a problem. The project is funded mainly by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Arditti is doing well at present, partly because of the customized exercise and partly because of COP-1, an experimental drug from Israel that she has been taking for several years.

Winnipeg honors its young leaders

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Beth Caren Goldberg and Neil Duboff are the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) Young Leadership Award winners for 1994-95.

Duboff received the Harry Silverberg Leadership Development Award, while Goldberg was the recipient of the Max Nathanson Young Leadership Award. Both have been active volunteers in the community.

A Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate graduate with a masters in educational administration, Goldberg began her communal involvement at Joseph Wolinsky. She has since volunteered with numerous groups, including the National Council of Jewish Women, Hadassah-WIZO, the Jewish Child and Family Service (of which she is a board member) and Shalom Square, the community's annual Folklorama entry. She presently co-chairs the CJA's new 365 Division.

Duboff, the managing partner in the law firm of Meltzer, Essers, Duboff, Schachter, was a founding member of the Community Legal Education Committee. He is the current president of the Jewish Child and Family Service and first vice-president of the Ramah School Board.

Duboff and Goldberg will be formally recognized in the spring at a special public event at which the first Sol Kanee Distinguished Community Service Medal and Max Shore Memorial Award winners will be named.

Wiesel shares passion for Torah study

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

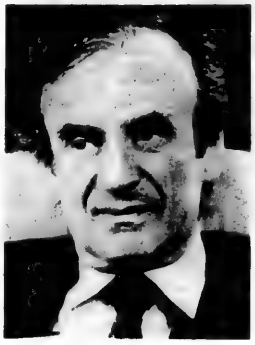
TORONTO — Nobel prize laureate Elie Wiesel shared some of his lifelong passion for Torah study with an overflow crowd at the Holy Blossom Temple recently, speaking on What The Ancient Masters Can Teach Our Generation.

Beginning with Genesis, Wiesel noted that God created one man and one woman so that no one in later generations could "pretend that he or she is better than anyone else. We all have the same grandfather."

Cain and Abel, he said, "were the only young men in the world. The whole world belonged to them, and yet one became the victim of the other. What happened? What moved them to use death as an instrument of their debate?"

And why, he asked, didn't their parents watch them more closely and stop them from hurting each other?

From this episode, Wiesel said, we learn that "whoever kills, kills his brother."



Elie Wiesel

"We all read newspapers and watch television, and we're all anguished with what happens in this crazy world. Brother kills brother — literally. I've been to Sarajevo, where many of the combatants are cousins, and I've seen it."

Regarding the binding of Isaac, Wiesel said that many aspects of this chapter cause problems for him. "I don't understand Isaac," he said. "Isaac helped his father prepare the altar and lay down and said, 'Bind me tightly because I'm afraid I'll move and the knife won't be pure.' Why did he become so submissive?"

Wiesel cited a progressive series of sketches that Rembrandt painted of Abraham and Isaac. "In the beginning you see Abraham as a cruel man, with the knife in his hand, ready to kill Isaac," he said. But sketch by sketch, Rembrandt's vision of the biblical episode known as the Akedah altered.

"At the end, the painting is totally different. Abraham is no longer the cruel father, the knife is on the ground, and father and son embrace. You see it and you want to cry for happiness, because father and son escape."

With the Akedah, God was testing Abraham, but Abraham was also testing God, said Wiesel. "I had the feeling from the very beginning that Abraham was not going to do it. It was actually a double test."

Although God gives the order to kill Isaac directly to Abraham, it is an angel who rescinds the command. "If God gave the order to kill, why not the order not to kill?" asked Wiesel. "I think it was because God was embarrassed."

Wiesel, author of Night, Dawn and other novels about the Holocaust — said that he relates the biblical story of the Akedah "to our generation, when father and son went together to another altar, and only the sons came back."

After commenting on Moses and other Pentateuchal figures, Wiesel said that one of the primary lessons of Talmud is tolerance and respect for others. "If you ask me what is the danger threatening our society and our world in the next century, I would say fanaticism and bigotry.

"Fanaticism is a danger because the fanatic believes that only he has the key to the truth, and only he has the truth. The fanatic would never accept dialogue because he only believes in monologue. The fanatic would never say that you are his equal. He would say that no one was his equal except fanatics like him."

Mt. Sinai doctor gets award

TORONTO — Dr. Anthony Pawson, senior scientist and head of the program in molecular biology and cancer at Mount Sinai Hospital's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, was honored on Oct. 24 at the 1994 Gairdner Foundation International Awards ceremony in Toronto.

Within the scientific community, the Gairdner award is considered an indicator of future Nobel Prize winners. More specifically, more than 40 former Gairdner Award winners, or one in five, have gone on to be awarded a Nobel Prize.

Pawson was honored for his work toward understanding the role that a group of proteins, tyrosine kinases, plays in controlling cellular responses to hormones and other signals. Alongside his team of investigators at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, Pawson made international news in February 1990 with the landmark discovery in understanding how cancer genes cause that disease.

Bialik gets award for commitment to environment

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The P.T.A. Environment Committee of Bialik Hebrew Day School recently received one of three Environment Awards of Excellence from the City of North York.

The award was presented at North York City Hall last month by Mayor Mel Lastman and Councillor John Filion, chair of the environment committee.

The Bialik P.T.A.'s Environment Committee was recognized for its "reduce, reuse and recycle" program, with some classes even using vermi-composting.

It produced newsletters, a Garbage Free Week, and an environment display in the school's resource centre during Earth Week to raise awareness of environmental issues.

Earth Week is a major event at the school. One highlight was the creation of a colorful patchwork quilt, representing the views of 800 students about the environment.

Environment Awareness Nights featured displays of composting, supported small business organizations that promoted environmentally friendly products, and sold reusable container products.

A two-year program brought awareness of how a better environment can be promoted in school and in the home.

The committee's efforts includes fundraising for planting trees in Israel. This year, over $7,000 was collected from students and parents.

Sun shines on Netivot HaTorah dedication

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The sun broke through the clouds just as the recent festivities to dedicate the new Netivot HaTorah Day School building were about to begin.

The ceremonies began with a parade for the Hachnasat Sefer Torah — the welcoming of the new Torah, followed by the dedication of the new building — the Jack and Anne Weinbaum Education Centre — named in honor of the school's main benefactors.

The newly-completed Torah was carried under a chupah to Netivot HaTorah. The Torah, the gift of Menachem and Ita Gutenberg and their son and daughter-in-law Allan and Tova, had been commissioned especially for the school.

About 300 people formed a procession at the corner of Rosedale Heights and Atkinson Avenue in Thornhill to accompany the new Sefer Torah to the school.

In the procession, they danced and sang and clapped their hands to chassidic songs. For Shauna Tepperman, who led the procession, this was the culmination of a 10-year odyssey.

"I can't believe I'm here with all these people, she told The CJN. "[The school] was a dream 10 years ago and now it's a reality."

One of the founders of Netivot HaTorah Tepperman was part of a small group of parents who were so committed to educating their children in an Orthodox Zionist day school that they started their own school.

In 1984, the first academic year, there were 40 students; today there are almost 500 in classes from junior kindergarten to Grade 8.

Netivot HaTorah classes have been held in rented facilities in three locations — Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, Temple Sinai and Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto — until the new 50,000-square-foot two-storey building at 18 Atkinson Ave. was constructed.

Menecham Gutenberg joyously carries a Sefer Torah under the Chupah together with his son Allan, his daughter-in-law Tova and grandchildren Daniel and Pnina. The Sefer Torah was presented to Netivot HaTorah Day School on the occasion of the dedication of the Jack and Anne Weinbaum Education Centre. [Zephr Studios photo]

It was built at a cost at $3 million on land subsidized by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. Netivot Hatorah has been affiliated with the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) since 1984 and has been fully funded by Federation through the BJE like other formula-funded day schools since 1986.

Rabbi Avi Schochet, the principal, told The CJN that having all the students under one roof has added to the school spirit and that all the students are now able to have gym. Previously there were no gym classes for students in Grade 5 and up.

Although the new school building was in use last year, Tepperman said it was fitting to celebrate the dedication of the building with presentation of the Torah.

"The Sefer Torah makes [the building] complete," she said. "The Torah is the foundation of our school."

"The dedication of the building is sanctified by the concurrent dedication of the Torah," Moishe Kesten, president of Netivot HaTorah, told the group assembled for the Hachnasat Sefer Torah prayer service.

Following services, the children went to the gym to watch a magic show, while the adults attended the dedication of the new school building in the auditorium.

Dignitaries present at the building dedication included Lorna Jackson, mayor of Vaughan; Bernard Ghert, president of Federation; Rabbi Moshe Stern, chair of the Orthodox Rabbinical Council; and Joey Steiner, chairman of the Board of Jewish Education.

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

JNF honoree Tanenbaum makes things happen

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Joey Tanenbaum believes that "many things happen by chance." But some people would argue that the 62-year-old entrepreneur, philanthropist, community leader and patron of the arts is the one who makes things happen.

Tanenbaum will be the honoree at the 46th Annual Negev Dinner of the Jewish National Fund (JNF) of Toronto on Nov. 27 at the Sheraton Centre Hotel.

Funds raised will establish the Joey Tanenbaum Youth Institute for Studies in Nature, History and the Environment at JNF's Camp Yatir in the northern Negev Desert.

In an interview in his art-filled St. Clair Avenue offices, Tanenbaum, who is the chairman of the board and president of Jay-M Holdings Ltd., spoke of the influences that direct his life.

He says that his grandfather, Abraham Tanenbaum, who arrived in Canada in 1911 from Parczew in Poland with $8 in his pocket, had a profound infuence on him and his family.

But it was his father who taught him about the world of business. A graduate of civil engineering at the University of Toronto, Joey and his late brother Harold entered the family's steel fabrication and production business, Runnymede Metal and Salvage Co.

In 1955, he married Toby Hochman of Chatham.

He left the family business and went on to acquire Hugh Russel Inc., the largest steel distributor in Canada. He became involved in Cineplex Odeon, bought the Pembroke Hydro Electric Power plant from his father's estate and then built the largest privately owned hydro electric plant in the province of Quebec with a 50-year contract to provide all the power generated from the 17 megawatt plant to Quebec Hydro.

He acquired Loc Pipe from Wimpey Construction in Whitby. The plant provides sewer and water pipes to the land development industry in Ontario.

The father of five children, four boys and a girl, he proudly notes that his daughter Susan is the president and CEO of Loc Pipe. Sons Michael, Alan, Martin and Rob are all working independently.

Joey has also become one of the world's best known private art collectors. It all began in 1964, when Toby convinced her husband that they should purchase an English painting to decorate their newly purchased English-style house. They began attending local auctions and as Joey says, "each acquisition fostered the desire for more paintings."

Today, their names are linked with numerous art institutions. Joey served as chair of the Canadian Opera Company and endowed the first permanent home of the opera company. He and his mother Anne Tanenbaum sponsored the National Ballet of Canada's visit to Germany and Israel this year. The Art Gallery of Ontario is the recipient of endowed galleries from the Tanenbaum family.

Joey says that a turning point in his life occurred on a UJA mission to Israel in 1978. At a luncheon at the Kfar Chabad centre just outside of Lod, the Lubavitcher message had a profound impact on him. Influenced by Rabbi Zalman Grossbaum of Toronto's Lubavitch organization, Joey now puts on tefillin every day.

Joey and Toby Tanenbaum have provided a laboratory at the U of T for the study of neurodegenerative diseases at the Tanz Centre, given funding for Ron Baird's steel sculpture at the Cottage Hospital in Uxbridge, Ont., donated the lobby entrance for the Leslie St. branch of the Associated Hebrew School, established funds for scholarship for Ethiopian immigrants to study at Ben-Gurion University and dedicated a Science Centre at Jerusalem's Michlala women's university.

Joey says that being the Negev Dinner honoree is "a very humbling experience and I am grateful to G-d for allowing me to live to see this glorious day."

Campaign chair is Ronald Appleby, dinner chair is Prof. Robert Prichard, president of the University of Toronto, and Patricia Alpert is JNF Toronto president.

Joey Tanenbaum in conversation with JNF Toronto vice president Tom Ungar at the Negev Dinner campaign kick-off at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

Peace opponents on the rise

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The closer Israel gets to peace, the more active are the opponents of peace, says the vice-president of Israel's largest trade fair and convention centre.

"We are seeing more and more peace at the borders but we are losing peace in our backyards," Lt.-Col. (Res.) Yona Gazit told a recent meeting sponsored by the United Jewish Appeal's community cabinet.

For seven years, Gazit was a shaliach (emissary) at UJA in Toronto.

He warned that the threat of Islamic fundamentalism is getting "bigger and bigger," noting that the Muslim Brotherhood, which once concerned itself with mosques and schools, recreated itself as Hamas in the late 1980s.

He said people should be concerned about Islamic fundamentalists who are spreading their philosophy throughout the West.

"In the United States in the past 10 years, 1,000 mosques have been built and each mosque gets a leader to spread its philosophy. They have sponsored a summer camp in Chicago in which car bombing was part of the curriculum," Gazit said.

"A mosque in Washington raises funds which go to Israel, and in South America, there are three cities in which the business community is controlled by the 20 per cent of the population that is Lebanese. They send funds to Lebanon and get religious leaders from Lebanon."

Asked about potential solutions, Gazit said "the problem is that we are dealing with people who only relate to God. Their beliefs have nothing to do with politics. Nothing matters but God."

He said the "bottom line is that we have reached peace agreements with governments but we are not guaranteed the kind of peace we are looking for if we have to worry about our family and friends taking the bus."

Sobolewski vows to maintain protest

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "What have I got to lose? I'm 72. I've had two heart attacks. I don't know how long I've got left to fight this terrible injustice."

With these words, prisoner No. 88 of Auschwitz, Sigmund Sobolewski, a Roman Catholic, explains to The CJN why taunts that he is a "Jew lover" will not silence his protest against a 20-metre high new monument, to be built at Auschwitz to the memory of its 70,000 Christian victims, while the fate of 1.4 million Jewish victims is largely ignored.

He took this message to a recent meeting at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, sponsored by the Jewish War Veterans of Canada and the synagogue's social action committee.

Sobolewski, a former oil rigger, lives in the village of Fort Assiniboine, Alberta, 320 km north of Edmonton, where the 150 residents are convinced he is a Jew because he has fought so hard for Jewish rights at Auschwitz.

"Windows in my tavern have been broken, I've had swastikas painted on my building, and my sign outside the village on the highway has been vandalized," Sobolewski said.

Now, the Polish-born ex-Auschwitz prisoner faces a new problem — his criticism of the Polish government's handling of Auschwitz museum matters has resulted, he says, in a threat to cancel his Polish visa.

Sobolewski's efforts have helped in the final recognition, after 46 years, that Jewish heroes blew up crematorium No. 4 at Birkenau, and the acknowledgment in a museum brochure that it was Jewish women who were the subjects of sterilization, not Slavic women in block No. 10.

At a memorial services at the railroad station where the first transport of Jews reached Poland in October, 1939, Sigmund Sobolewski, in prison uniform, and Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Calgary take part.

Now, he is indignant that a momument to Christians is to be built on the grounds of the former Carmelite convent at Auschwitz.

"There are denials that this monument is to be built, but I have copies of the bylaws of the Oswiecim city council approving it. [Auschwitz is in the city's territory.] The argument of the mayor of Oswiecim is that the convent grounds are where the ashes of Polish Christians lie. That is pure nonsense. The ashes of Jews cremated at Birkenau were dumped in the pond, on fields, and everywhere. How can anyone prove that anyone's ashes are in a speciic place?"

Sobolewski says the Jewish War Veterans of Canada will add muscle to his protest. In a separate statement backing Soblewski's charges, the Veterans announced the establishment of a Canada-wide chapter of the Auschwitz Awareness Society. The Veterans' statement also said Beth Tikvah Synagogue is establishing its own chapter.

As he always does, Sobolewski wore his Auschwitz prison uniform at the Beth Tikvah meeting. "I wear this uniform as an honor. I wasn't a capo, I didn't commit any crimes. Why shouldn't I wear it?"

And wear it he did at demonstrations outside Polish consular offices in Vancouver and recently, in Chicago. The consuls in question, he said, denied that a monument to Christians is to be built at Auschwitz.

"But they are just taking at face value the denials of the Auschwitz museum officials, who are not behind the move. It is the Oswiecim city council that is doing it, but there is not the political will to stop it."

Sobolewski, an official observer at the International Auschwitz Council, and who has attended four of its meetings, said the council refused to entertain a motion censuring the Polish government for pemitting the monument.

A feature film, Prisoner 88 partly financed by the National Film Board and based on Sobolewski's experiences, will be out next spring. Publication is also expected in 1995 of a Random House book by Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Calgary about the Auschwitz Museum situation.

Women resisted Holocaust by writing their life stories

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Four women who wrote autobiographies as acts of resistance during the Holocaust were affirming humankind during times of inhumanity, says a professor at University of Wisconsin-Madison.

"In their writings, Edith Stein, Simone Weil, Anne Frank and Etty Hillesum all displayed profound concern with a world that ceased to be concerned with them," said Rachel Feldhay Brenner who spoke during Holocaust Education Week, at a lecture co-sponsored by the Jewish Feminist Anti-Fascist League and the Holocaust Education Committee.

She said that Edith Stein, born in 1891, converted to Christianity and even entered a convent; yet in 1933, she started writing her autobiography entitled Life in a Jewish Family because she wanted the German youth to learn about Judaism. In 1942 she was deported to Auschwitz where she died.

Simone Weil, born in 1909, left France for New York in 1940 but later returned to Europe, where she died of self-inflicted starvation as a sign of solidarity with the people starving under German oppression.

Anne Frank, author of the famous autobiography, was born in 1929 and died in Bergen-Belsen in 1945. And Etty Hillesum born in 1914 was an assimilated Jew who perished in Auschwitz in 1944.

"Why did these women continue to care, even though they were doomed to death? What did it mean to know they were doomed, yet still sit there and write? How did they find the peace of mind to write when they knew their life could end at any minute?" Feldhay Brenner asked the capacity crowd of mostly women.

She said that they grew up in Western Europe believing in the concept of brotherhood as a way to de-emphasize ethnic distinction.

"They were loyal, integrated and patriotic. Some philosophers think they supported the idea that the individual has a sense of collectivity. Anne Frank believed that everything would come to an end and everyone, including Jews would be equal. She said that 'if God lets me live, I shall work in the world for mankind.' Their very act of writing communicated a sense of responsibility to a place that had condemned them to death. While they were writing they were on a poignant, moving quest to find out who they were."

Feldhay Brenner said that these four women are examples of people who passively resisted the Holocaust. "In one of Anne Frank's last entries she wrote that 'I can see the world turning into wilderness . . . but if I look into the heavens I think the cruelty will end and peace and tranquillity will reign again.' "

Sault Ste. Marie starts work to expand its shul

SAULT STE. MARIE — As a kickoff celebration of its 50th anniversary year, Sault Ste. Marie's Beth Jacob Synagogue held a ceremony to mark the expansion of the congregation's facilities.

Wilfred Cohen, the oldest member of the shul and representative of the families who built the synagogue in 1945, cut the ribbon, officially opening the new addition. The expansion means extra classroom space for the synagogue's education program on Sundays.

A speaker at the opening ceremony, Susan Jackson, director of community services and youth activities, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC), told the congregants: "You have given a wonderful gift to yourselves and your children with this expanded gathering place."

Money for the expansion was raised among shul members. There are about 90 persons (including children) affiliated with Beth Jacob. Members include five families from Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, as well as one living in Manitouwadge, Ont., about a three-hour drive north of the Sault.

On Sunday mornings at the shul's new facility, there are five classes in Beth Jacob's education program. Previously, said teacher Bryna Coppel-Park, some classes were held in the cloakroom, or on the stage of the auditorium with the curtain drawn.

Besides conducting classes, members also lead services, except on yomim tovim when two gentlemen from Toronto are invited.

As part of the expansion, the shul building's heating system was updated and the kitchen was expanded. This should make possible more events at the shul including a community seder, said Jeff Arbus, one of the Beth Jacob members who teaches at the school.

The first Jews settled in the Sault in the 1890s, he said. The city's overall population today is about 81,000.

Arbus praised CJC "for its encouragement and its assistance via supplies and resources. Regional staffer Susan Jackson has been most supportive of our activities and programs."

Also in attendance were non-Jews who helped in the fundraising or in the building of the addition.

The day before the opening, Coppel-Park's daughter Shanna had her bat mitzvah. A sit-down luncheon for 140 was held — an event which could not have taken place at Beth Jacob before the expansion.

BBW to honor Gibson

TORONTO — Anne Armstrong Gibson has been chosen as the recipient of the 38th annual Woman Of The Year Award of B'nai Brith Women (BBW) of Toronto.

The honor will be bestowed on Gibson at the BBW of Toronto Covenant Breakfast at Monte Cassino Place, Salon A, 3710 Chesswood Drive, Downsview, Nov. 20 at 10 a.m.

BBW of Toronto is honoring Gibson for her vision, courage and outstanding achievement as founder of WELLspring, a support centre for people with cancer and their families, located at The Coach House, 81 Wellesley St. E.

A devoted mother to eight children, three dogs and two cats, she is also an estate lawyer, a member of the Canadian and American Bar Association and author of several legal papers on wills and estates.

Gibson was the recipient of the Breast Cancer Foundation Award of Merit 1991, the Toronto Sun Award of Excellence 1993 and was nominated for a 1993 Courage To Come Back Award by the Clarke Institute.

Anne Armstrong Gibson

When diagnosed with non-Hodgkin's lymphoma, Gibson suffered fears about treatment, survival and her family's future. Like others, she experienced an overwhelming sense of isolation.

During her three years of radiation and chemotherapy treatments, she was often near death.

Gibson hired a doctor with whom she established the trust, confidence and support previously lacking and from her hospital bed, founded WELLspring, a charitable centre offering social and emotional support to people living with cancer and to their families.

Just as things were starting to look hopeful, her husband suffered a massive stroke and died in December 1993. This sudden loss combined with her children's needs and her desire to be with them, strengthened her resolve.

In May 1992, WELLspring opened its doors. Since then, over 3,000 people have passed through WELLspring's doors.

Bar association honors Sandler

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a criminal lawyer, Mark Sandler, 39, steers clear of cases alleged to be hate-related or dealing with human rights violations. As senior counsel to B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, he is steeped in those issues.

"Prosecutors like to kid me," Sandler said recently, alluding to his unlikely dual specialties during an interview at his downtown office. A partner in the law firm of Cooper, Sandler, West & Skurka, Sandler is a part-time assistant crown attorney who also teaches at Osgoode Hall Law School.

His 12-year affiliation with the League for Human Rights was recognized recently when he received the Canadian Bar Association's Young Lawyers and Notaries' Pro Bono Services Award. The newly established award, which he shared with one other lawyer, is for lawyers under age 40 "who have demonstrated outstanding commitment to their community through pro bono [free] legal work."

Sandler directed half of his $500 award money to Temple Emanu-El's recent Social Action Day; the other half went to the League for Human Rights for its symposium on legal remedies for hate crimes, held last month in Toronto.

Sandler's affiliation with the League began by chance, when his wife, also a lawyer, contacted the organization after seeing a swastika on a downtown building. At the time the League was looking for someone to assist them with criminal law.

Sandler has appeared on behalf of the League in a number of Supreme Court cases, including the trials of Holocaust deniers Ernst Zundel and James Keegstra.

"I'm a great believer in the use of criminal law to combat [hate-related crimes]. I believe deterrent sentences like jail are an important tool in fighting [crime], but the foremost weapon in our arsenal is education," Sandler says.

Mark Sandler

A major part of the League's work is education about racism, anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial. Sandler has been a lecturer and panelist on topics such as Hate Group Activity in Canada, How Communities Can Respond to Racism, and Hate Lyrics in Popular Music.

STREET KIDS: One teen's cry for help

plementary school, until his bar mitzvah. Jewish holiday celebrations and rabbinical visits meant a lot to him during the months he was in detention, he says.

Todd's childhood was marred by serious disagreements with his parents as well as academic and behavioural difficulties in school. A long-term illness within the family also left its mark.

One warm summer day when Todd was 13, he took the subway downtown, wandered until nightfall and then headed for Covenant House, a shelter for street kids.

"When they found out my age," he recalls, "they called Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS)." Todd ended up living in a foster home, then in a group home. His high school education has been piecemeal, and is not yet complete.

Although he's not sure what he wants to do in the future, he enjoys working with his hands and is thinking about taking a carpentry course. He loves kids and sees himself getting married, "but not for a while," he says, with a quick smile.

"I think he has the goods to make it," says Todd's social worker. "The issue is whether he can channel some of the stuff he has inside [him] in a constructive fashion."

The value Todd places on family underscores much of his experience. He preferred foster care over the group home, "because it's more of a family unit." After running away from the group home at 15, he became friendly with a group of about eight or 10 young teens with whom he shared attitudes and values. The group became a surrogate family, looking out for each other's welfare and serving as protection from the seamier side of street life.

Common pitfalls for street kids, such as prostituting, "happen to people who don't have anyone," Todd believes. "We [the guys] always took care of the girls," he says. "Little romances" were common within the group.

Sometimes they slept in stairwells, and once were fortunate enough to be treated to coffee and pastry by a baker who found them early in the morning. Sometimes they were able to share an apartment.

To earn extra money, they got "terrible jobs," such as filling newspaper boxes at 3 a.m. Sometimes they went to food banks or churches for meals. Other times they stole food, but Todd emphasizes that they never used violence or weapons. He never panhandled.

Drugs never played a big role in his life on the street, Todd says, but "there was always something around. We never got into hard drugs like heroin or crack."

Todd says he's glad he got off the street. He admits that the freedom of street life can be romanticized, but not street life itself. "It's not nice," he says tersely.

He would advise kids who are having trouble at home to "try to stick with it. Don't just run away, and if you do run, run to someone, like JF&CS. They help a lot of kids. Everyone needs someone.

"If some kid somewhere will read [this article] and smarten up, it'll make me feel okay," Todd says.

He advises parents to "try to look at things from the kid's point of view before you explode. They're just kids. You've got to show kids you care about them. My dad was always working. His way of making me feel good is getting me a new toy."

Although Todd says he gets along with his parents reasonably well now, and has lived with them at intervals over the past few years, he now has his own apartment and says he will remain on his own. "I've been free for so long. All of a sudden having rules [would be too difficult]."

Todd remains close to his grandmother, whom he saw every week when he was on the street. "My bubbie always made sure I knew people cared about me," he says.

Diabetes affects 1.5 million Canadians

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —We all had them; relatives who had something vaguely referred to as "sugar," an ailment that was seldom really defined, and usually talked about in hushed tones.

What they had was diabetes, a disease that until this century was inevitably fatal.

The remarkable research of Dr. Frederick Banting and Dr. Charles Best at the University of Toronto in discovering insulin, as well as more recent research into lifestyle changes have combined to, by and large, make diabetes a treatable, usually controllable condition.

In diabetes, part of the complicated process of converting food into energy, breaks down.

Insulin, the chemical produced in the pancreas, must be present in the bloodstream in order for the cells of the body to absorb glucose, the pure form of sugar created by the digestive system to act as fuel for the body.

There are two types of diabetes; Type 1, also called juvenile or insulin-dependent diabetes; or Type II, sometimes called maturity-onset or non-insulin dependent.

Type I is probably the kind people think of most, although, according to the Juvenile Diabetes Foundation Canada only 150,000 of the 1.5 million diabetics in Canada have this form. Frequently starting in childhood, it occurs when the body can produce litle or no insulin of its own.

Type II, on the other hand, occurs when the body either doesn't produce enough insulin, or cannot adequately utilize what it does produce. Symptoms and complications tend to be less severe than in Type I.

The cause of diabetes is uncertain.

Symptoms can include increased and often severe thirst, greatly increased urination, weight loss, itching of the skin, fatigue, changes in vision, and slow healing of cuts and bruises.

Diet and exercise are the main ways of dealing with diabetes, as well as carefully controlled medication — insulin therapy for Type I and severe cases of Type II or, if necessary, oral drug therapy for Type II.

Current, vigorous research has made changes in the treatment of this disease. Much more attention is now given to a diet high in complex carbohydrates (such as grains and pastas), and vegetables, a moderate amount of protein, and low in simple carbohydrates and sugars and fats.

Exercise is also seen as important in controlling diabetes, as it appears to improve the body's ability to use insulin.

It is important to note that insulin therapy is not a cure for diabetes — it merely approximates the body's insulin-making capabilities.

A worldwide study currently going on that seems to indicate that frequent testing of blood glucose levels, combined with necessary changes in insulin therapy, is highly effective in controlling diabetes and in preventing complications.

The complications are terrifying, including blindness, heart disease, nerve damage (especially in the legs and feet), stroke, amputations and kidney failure.

The Jewish Chapter of the Canadian Diabetes Association, founded by, among others, well-known nutritionist Esther Schwartz, is an educational, information and support group for Jewish diabetics.

Besides lectures on various aspects of dealing with this disease, the chapter offers recipes and hints for combining diabetic restrictions with kosher requirements and holiday customs.

November is National Diabetes Month. With education, proper care, and, especially, on-going research, diabetes can, hopefully, become, like so many other diseases, a footnote in medical history books.

For more information, contact Schwartz at 782-2176.

ANNE FRANK TULIP PLANTING

For the fifth year, children from Brown Public School in Toronto took part in planting 750 tulip bulbs in memory of Anne Frank and one and a half million other Jewish children who perished during World War II. The ceremony was held at Amsterdam parkette at Avenue Road and St. Clair. The new consul general of the Netherlands, Paul Schellekens, (bending over planting tulip bulbs) and Canadian Jewish war veterans from Wingate Branch in Toronto dug into the soil and planted along with the children. Robert Engel, past chair of the Holocaust Education Centre, Judy Gwartz, past chair of the Anne Frank exhibit and Ada Wynston, founder of Adopt A Veteran and a Dutch Jewish Hidden Child participated in the ceremony. Tribute held for Shoshana Shier

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Hebrew University professor recently paid tribute to the late Shoshana Shier, one of his students when he was on a sabbatical at the University of Toronto.

Delivering the Shoshana Shier Lecture, which he asked to do on a volunteer basis, Dov Noy said the Toronto woman played a crucial part in the establishment of the just-announced Chair of Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto.

Noy told the overflow audience of 250 at the George Ignatieff Theatre that he renewed his friendship with Shier and her husband, Milton, every year when they visited Israel, where he is the Max and Margarethe Grunwald professor of Jewish Folklore at Hebrew University.

To honor Shier, who died in April, Noy chose as his topic The Rose (Shoshana) in Universal and Jewish Folklore.

Prior to the lecture, Libby Garshowitz, head of Jewish Studies at the university, said: "It was Shoshana Shier's dream to see a Chair of Jewish Studies at the university and now it has become a reality."

Mother a lifelong student

Son Joseph Shier described his mother as a lifelong student who never went to an academic high school, but as a mature student earned enough credits to graduate from the university in 1973.

Her devotion to learning was such that in a six-week period between chemotherapy treatments in the summer of 1993, she and her husband joined an Oxford University study tour in England sponsored by the Biblical Archeology Society of Washington, D.C.

Yiddish was the mother tongue in the home of her parents, the late Percy and Sadie Sherman, but she was such an apt pupil of the venerated Hebrew teacher Abraham Shkop in the Brunswick Street Talmud Torah that Israelis did not believe that she was not a Sabra, her husband told The CJN.

In an intriguing lecture well illustrated with examples from biblical lore and modern literature, Professor Noy traced the audio-oral and visual importance of the rose in Jewish folklore.

He paid a personal tribute to Shoshana Shier by describing her as a woman brought up in the Zionist tradition that diverse groups and cultures can get along together.

While visiting a Na'amat day-care centre in Tel Aviv, National Capital Campaigns chair, Louise Cornblum, and Na'amat Canada immediate past president, Rhonda Blanshay, distribute toys sent by members in Canada.

Dollars for David campaign helps children in Israel

On a recent tour of Na'amat day care centres in low income areas of Israel, Na'amat Canada national officers, Rhona Blanshay of Montreal and Louise Cornblum of Toronto, confirmed the continuing need for Dollars for David Chanukah gifts.

"Na'amat's day-care centres really change the futures of children from Israel's deprived areas," Blanshay told The CJN.

"First, we make it possible for both parents to work without concern about their preschoolers, so that the living standards of the whole family can be raised. Then we make sure that the children get both the hot nourishing food that they need for physical growth and the intellectual stimulation that will give them the head start necessary to guarantee their own future success in life."

"And we care about their emotional strength, too — their happiness," said Cornblum. "That's where Dollars for David comes in. It's just as important to see that the children aren't overlooked at special times like Chanukah as it is to care for their other needs."

Dollars for David is a fund established 21 years ago by Goldie Burstein of Toronto to buy Chanukah presents for Israeli children who might otherwise be disappointed at gift-giving time.

To avoid singling out needy children from their peers, Na'amat gives a top or book or doll, along with a candy treat, to each of the 25,000 children in their 850 day-care centres.

The money to pay for this is raised entirely in Canada, over 50 per cent of it from readers of The CJN who respond to the orange envelopes that are enclosed in the paper. Forty per cent of the balance comes from Jewish school children in many cities. The rest is contributed by Na'amat members and their friends.

Jewish pianist reunited with Pole 49 years later

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Henri-Michael Wronski will never forget the pile of murdered Jews, patients from a hospital in Nazi-occupied Poland, or the moans of those in the hill of corpses not yet dead.

Wronski, then a well-to-do young Pole, said the sight made him resolve to save other Jews from a similar fate.

He met Leo Spellman, a popular young Jewish pianist whose music he loved, and realized Spellman and his wife Mary were in great danger.

Aware that the Nazis had begun liquidating the ghetto in Ostrowiec, Wronski hid the couple for more than a year, risking not only his own life but the lives of his family, friends and neighbors.

Wronski, Spellman and his wife were recently reunited after 49 years at a Toronto hotel.

"I was crying when he walked out from the hotel," Spellman said. "I recognized him right away."

Two years ago Wronski decided to see the couple again before he died. He got Spellman's address from Spellman's first cousin, Wladislaw Spellman, a well-known Polish pianist, and an exchange of letters led to the reunion.

"We lived through such a hard time together in hiding, that we are together again is a miracle," said Wronski, with Spellman translating from Polish.

The couple's first hideout was the back of a vacant store rented by Wronski, who was then a 21-year-old high school student. After two months, Wronski was ordered to vacate the store for a German woman.

Apartment door padlocked

Next he took a two-room apartment for the Spellmans. It was located "right under the nose of the Germans and the police," near Nazi headquarters and a Polish police station, said Spellman.

Wronski was frequently away and kept a padlock on the apartment door. "Many times the Germans came," remembered Spellman. When they pounded on the door, a Polish neighbor would come out and tell them the student was away.

The couple had to keep as quiet as a fly on the wall most of the time, he said, and they were unable to cook meals during the day. The smoke from the stove would have been a giveaway because the stovepipe was shared with Polish neighbors who were away at a flea market six days a week.

Wronski brought small amounts of food to the Spellmans in a briefcase, as large quantities would have aroused suspicion.

Since there was no indoor toilet, Wronski would carry waste matter out. "If they caught him with it, they'd have killed him," Spellman said. "What a risk he took."

Wronski created two hiding places within the apartment for the Spellmans, a six-foot hole beneath a wardrobe and a hall closet, which Spellman says "was plastered up like there was nothing there."

The couple hid whenever anyone came to the door or entered the apartment. "If Polish people were there, we didn't know if they were good or bad," said Mary Spellman.

The German military police visited Wronski while he was digging the hole, and fortunately believed him when he told them he was going to use it as a bomb shelter.

When eight Nazis, retreating from the Russians towards the end of the war, broke into the apartment, the Spellmans hid in the closet for five terrifying days without food or water. "We had a little hole," Spellman remembered. "We could see what they were doing."

On one occasion, after the Germans passed out from a night of drinking, hunger got the better of the Spellmans. "I opened the door and stole a piece of bread," said Spellman, as he burst into tears.

In the morning, an argument about the missing bread ensued between two soldiers, with one accusing the other of stealing. After spotting the plastered door, a soldier started pushing against it, but the Spellmans pushed back. "We were lucky he gave up," said Spellman.

The Nazis left the Spellmans' hideout, and Poland, at the same time. Soon the Spellmans watched columns of Russian soldiers coming through Ostrowiec as they liberated the country.

During the Nazi-occupation of Poland, educated young Poles like Wronski who were considered wealthy — his father owned a 30-acre farm — were hunted by the Nazis. "You didn't have to be Jewish," Spellman said.

He stressed that Wronski saved their lives without taking any payment. "The only thing I ever gave him was some money for food."

Shlomo Carlebach — storyteller par excellence

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "Gevalt! My sweet friends. It's so beautiful to see you and so beautiful to hear you."

The spirit of Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach will forever live in the hearts of the hundreds of thousands of Jews who came in contact with the charismatic Jewish composer, singer and storyteller.

Generations of Jews yet to be born will chant his prayers and sing his folk songs, melodies that have become standards in synagogue services, at weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, and at simchahs.

"Shlomo was the only person that I ever saw who could enter a room with a thousand strangers, and after an evening of song, Torah and storytelling and dancing, people would leave hugging and kissing each other," says his brother-in-law, Toronto composer Srul Irving Glick.

The legendary Rabbi Carlebach died of a heart attack in New York City while waiting for the departure of a plane to Toronto to spend Shabbat with his family. He was 69. His funeral took place on Oct. 23 in New York City at his congregation and he was buried in his beloved Jerusalem.

Despite his tours to every corner of the Jewish world, his wife Neila and his daughters Neshama and Nadara (Dari), who live in Toronto, brought him the greatest joy and naches. He often referred to his daughters as "the soul of my soul," and he recently completed an album, yet to be released, with his daughter Neshama.

He came into prominence in the 1960s. He realized that many young people had turned away from Judaism and had found their way to the San Francisco area. Looking like a hippy rabbi, he used his guitar and music to attract the young and alienated Jews on the streets.

Haunting melodies

In the '60s and '70s, the chassidic folk singer who spun parables and chassidic tales began travelling with his guitar, creating thousands of haunting melodies. He revolutionized modern Jewish music by blending early chassidic nigunim (melodies) with contemporary influences.

Toronto's Zale Newman, who produced 13 of Carlebach's record albums and three CDs, praised the late artist.

"There is a classic dispute among people who are great admirers of Shlomo," he said. "Some feel his greatness is in being the greatest Jewish songwriter since King David. Others believe that his greatest gift was being a magid — a story teller. But all agree that his greatest attribute by far was his ahavas Israel — his love for his fellow Jewish sisters and brothers."

Rabbi Carlebach was born in pre-Nazi Germany. The family fled the Nazis in 1933 and lived in Switzerland before coming to New York in 1939. He studied in prestigious yeshivot, received his rabbinic ordination and went on to study comparative religion, geology and psychology at Columbia University. In his youth, he wanted to be a rabbi, a therapist or a musician. He was ultimately able to be all three.

In 1977, he and his wife started a settlement in Israel at Modiim, a moshav in the Judean Hills. For the past decade, he resided in Israel several months a year and in Manhattan; he was frequently in Toronto.

"Shlomo's light has not left our world," Glick said. "His songs, his teaching, his stories and his humanity will continue to illuminate our lives from generation to generation."

A foundation has been established to compile and publish Rabbi Carlebach's music, to establish a scholarship in Jewish music, and to initiate other educational programs. For information contact The Shlomo Carlebach Foundation, 185 Davenport Rd., Toronto, Ontario, M5R 1J1.

Zhirinovsky slams Russian Jews

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

UNITED NATIONS — If Russian ultranationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky was hoping his trip to the United States would clean up his image as a potential dictator and anti-Semite, he failed.

At a news conference here last week, he called Jews a negative influence on Russia and blamed them for the Bolshevik revolution, the breakup of a strong Soviet state and criminal enterprises in his country.

He then renounced anti-Semitism.

"We have a very good attitude to all minorities in Russia," he said through a translator, saying that neither he nor his Liberal Democratic Party has formally taken a position on the Jewish minority.

Zhirinovsky addressed the United Nations Correspondents Association last Wednesday, following a speech Monday night to the World Affairs Council in San Francisco.

Vladimir Zhirinovsky

B'nai Brith Canada called on Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi to keep Zhirinovsky out of this country [CJN, Nov. 10] but there was no indication the Russian was interested in coming to Canada.

As hundreds of demonstrators rallied outside the downtown San Francisco hotel where he spoke last Monday night, Zhirinovsky repeatedly denied that he or his party stand for extremism of any kind.

"We have no radical views of anything," he said. "We have only radical views of what should be done in this situation" to solve problems in Russia.

And he rejected claims that he or his party promotes anti-Semitism. He blamed his reputation on inaccurate media reports.

"Anti-Semitism is not in the program of our party, but this is the real life in Russia," he said through an interpreter. "We are strongly opposed to it and we are struggling against it."

At the UN, asked whether he thought Jews played a positive role in Russia, he replied, "I can't say they are playing a positive role. They are playing a negative role.

"We are patriots of the state, but the majority of those who welcomed the destruction of the state are those who represent the Jewish minority," he said.

Zhirinovsky then proceeded to distance himself from that: "This is not my position. This is the position of the people," he said.

Continuing in his original vein, he said Russia's "new business structures are held mostly by Jewish people. Lots of people understand that a lot of money in these structures is criminal. This explains our opposition to these criminal structures.

"This is not our position. This is the position of the people," he repeated.

Similarly, Zhirinovsky put the blame on "present propaganda" for saying that "the October Revolution in 1917 was made by those who had been mostly Jewish.

"But this is not our word. This is the word of propaganda. The propaganda is saying the previous regime is a cruel regime — that is why they are against those who made this revolution.

"That is why I would like only to explain what happened. When we are asked why there is anti-Semitism in Russia, we say this is why. We are giving the reason," he said.

Zhirinovsky again denied lingering reports that his father was Jewish.

"If you find me Jewish parents, I would be happy to embrace him, kiss him, but unfortunately all my relatives are Russian. I would be happy to have any relatives of any nationality," he said.

But the Russian parliamentarian, whose party captured 23 per cent of the vote in last December's elections, was forthright about his desire to serve as his country's dictator.

Asked whether he saw any common ground with Russian President Boris Yeltsin, he praised the new Russian constitution for providing for a "strong authoritarian regime," which he lamented has not yet come to pass.

"This is the only way to resolve the present crisis," he said.

"In principle, I am in favor of a democratic regime, a parliamentary republic. But in our current crisis, such a regime cannot produce results."

Jordan, Israel seal pact during Hussein's visit

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Jordan's King Hussein officially sealed the peace between their countries last Thursday, exchanging ratified copies of their historic peace treaty at a ceremony on the shores of the Sea of Galilee.

Hussein arrived in Israel shortly after Israeli and Jordanian officials inaugurated a second border crossing between their countries.

Marking what was his first public visit to Israel, the king revealed to reporters what has long been suspected: that he had visited Israel in secret many times before.

He is the second Arab leader, after Egypt's former President Anwar Sadat, officially to visit Israel.

Accompanying King Hussein to the ceremony site at the Bet Gavriel guest house on the shores of the Sea of Galilee were Crown Prince Hassan and Jordanian officials who have been involved in the peace talks with Israel. Israeli officials from across the political spectrum attended the event.

In contrast to the Arava desert landscape where the peace treaty was signed on Oct. 26, Thursday's ceremony took place against the lush background of the Sea of Galilee, known in Israel as the Kinneret.

Referring to the setting, Rabin said, "I believe this is the most beautiful scene to do the most beautiful act — to end our state of war."

Hussein said Israel and Jordan were on "the threshold of peace, which I hope generations to come will cherish, protect and enjoy."

He also said he hoped peace agreements with the remaining neighboring Arab states would be reached soon.

Following the exchange of the ratified peace treaty, Rabin and Hussein held a working session on the peace process. The two leaders discussed the demarcation of their borders and methods for sharing the scant regional water resources.

Earlier in the day, the northern border crossing between Israel and Jordan was officially opened.

The crossing at the rebuilt Sheik Hussein Bridge, located south of the Sea of Galilee near Kibbutz Maoz Haim, is the second border crossing to be opened since Israel and Jordan decided to make peace.

Israelis watched the opening of the northern border crossing on Jordanian television.

Planes flew in formation over the bridge, doves were released into the sky, and schoolgirls from both countries presented bouquets of flowers. After the ceremony, hundreds of Israelis and Jordanians crossed over the narrow green bridge.

Israel almost secured Arad's release: researcher

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BONN — The collapse of East Germany five years ago last week may have prevented a prisoner exchange deal that included efforts to return Israeli navigator Ron Arad and other missing Israeli soldiers in Lebanon, according to new documents made public in Germany.

The documents, obtained by Prof. Michael Wolffsohn, an Israeli historian working in Germany, included a written agreement between Israel and East Germany and internal memoranda of the East German government.

The key figures in the deal were East German lawyer Wolfgang Vogel and Israeli lawyer Amnon Zichroni. Both signed the agreement in 1989 on behalf of their respective governments.

Vogel, who brokered the exchange of spies and the ransom of some 30,000 prisoners from East Germany and the Soviet Union during the Cold War — including former Refusenik Natan Sharansky — was last week brought before a Berlin court on blackmail charges.

According to the deal regarding Arad, East Germany reportedly would have done its best to secure the release of the missing Israeli airman. In return, Israel would have released convicted Soviet spies Marcus Klingberg and Shabtai Kalmanovitz.

The prisoner exchange was also to include the terrorist Hamadei brothers, both of whom were imprisoned in Germany; Sheik Abdul Karim Obeid, a leader of the Islamic fundamentalist Hezbollah movement who had been kidnapped by the Israelis; and Nelson Mandela, who at the time was still in a South African jail.

Had it gone through, it might have been one of the biggest prisoner exchanges of the decade.

Perhaps the most important point in the documents located by Wolffsohn was Vogel's strong belief that Arad was alive at the time, two-and-a-half years after his plane had been shot down over Lebanon.

Arad bailed out from his fighter plane over Lebanon in 1986 and was believed to have been held by pro-Iranian troops in Lebanon.

There have been sporadic reports that he was subsequently transferred to captivity in Iran.

Documents released earlier this year suggested that Arad was held by the Amal Shi'ite organization under Syrian auspices in West Beirut until the spring of 1989.

But negotiations for the prisoner swap dragged on, and then the entire deal fell through with the collapse of East Germany in November 1989.

U.S. vote not expected to affect Israel

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials said last week they doubt that the Republican landslide in the recent American mid-term elections for Congress will harm U.S.-Israeli relations.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin would not comment directly on the election results.

"I don't think we have to say anything about domestic political developments in (the United States). The American people have decided," he told Israel Radio, adding, "I believe support for Israel is wide and encompasses the two major parties."

Likud opposition party leader Benjamin Netanyahu echoed those sentiments, but warned that Israel should prepare for reductions in American aid. Over the past several years, Congress has approved an annual $3 billion in aid to Israel, the highest recipient of U.S. aid.

Netanyahu described last week's election results as part of a trend "for greater introspection in the United States, regardless of political parties involved."

He told Israel Radio that Israel has to "adopt a long-term plan to wean ourselves from dependency on American financial support, not because there will be anti-Israeli sentiments in America, but because there will be fewer resources that will go abroad."

Danny Halperin, a former economic attache to the United States, told Israel Radio that from now on, "Israel and its supporters will have to pay more attention to what's happening on Capitol Hill, and not just in the administration."

Japanese paper apologizes for 'racist' books

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TOKYO — A prominent Japanese daily newspaper has formally apologized to Jewish groups for advertising books which claim the world is secretly controlled by Jews.

The apology by Yomiuri Shimbun, said to be the world's largest-circulation newspaper, was issued last week to the American Jewish Committee and Anti-Defamation League in response to protests by those groups and by the Israeli embassy in Tokyo.

The advertisement by the Tokuma Shoten Publishing Co., which ran recently in the 10-million circulation newspaper, promoted a number of books which "explain" modern history as a series of Jewish plots to dominate the world.

In an identical letter sent to Neil Sandberg, director of the AJCommittee's Pacific Rim Institute, and ADL National Director Abraham Foxman, the heads of Yomiuri Shimbun's advertising and public relations departments wrote, "We sincerely regret the publishing of an advertisement which, as you point out, can be said to promote racism.

"We accept your criticism on this matter and disassociate ourselves from the contents of the advertisement in question," they wrote, adding:

"Please be assured that henceforth, taking your point into consideration, we shall redouble our efforts to avoid the printing of advertisements without checking their credibility, and to deal with world affairs without bias or bigotry."

According to reports from Tokyo, Jewish conspiracy books are a cottage industry in Japan. Generally in the form of mystery-thrillers, the books' plots might link such people as the Pope, the Queen of England and U.S. presidents as Zionist conspirators bent on destroying Japanese industry.

Despite the popularity of such books, with sales over 1 million, Rabbi James Lebeau of Temple Beth David in Tokyo said he had never heard of any attacks or violence against Jews in Japan. An estimated 2,000 Jews, mostly Americans, live in Japan.

The issue of the anti-Semitic books is years old and has been on the agenda of numerous meetings between Jewish groups and Japanese officials. Symposiums have been held on the subject and Japanese scholars have spoken out vociferously against the books while explaining the myriad reasons for their existence.

The AJCommittee and Simon Wiesenthal Centre held meetings in past years with the Japanese Publishers and Editors Association, advertising executives and government officials.

Asked why the problem continues, Sandberg ventured that "the Japanese culture moves very slowly. When decisions are made, even major ones, by government or other key institutional entities, it takes time for the messages to be conveyed and appropriate corrective action to take place."

Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said he attended four meetings on this matter in October 1993 in Japan. He met with executives of the newspapers Yomiuri Shimbun and Nikei Shimbun, "both of which had run the same kind of ads last year."

He also met with executives of Asahi Shimbum and with the publishers and editors group.

Given the recurrence of this type of advertisement, he said, "It is quite appropriate that they would issue an apology."

German compensation

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The German government has enacted new legislation benefitting persons reclaiming property in the former East Germany, the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany announced last week.

The new measure, which will go into effect Dec. 1, will affect property that was confiscated or forcibly sold by the Nazis, or nationalized by the Soviet military government after World War II, or by the East German Communist regime that followed.

The legislation, known as the German Law for Compensation in Lieu of Restitution, is intended to compensate with funds those who had filed claims for property by June 30, 1993, under an earlier law, known as the German Property Restitution Law, according to Saul Kagan, executive director of the Claims Conference.

The legislation benefits persons, or their heirs, who lost real estate, business enterprises and other assets which cannot be recovered in kind because their restitution is impossible. It also affects persons who elect compensation rather than restitution in kind.

The new measure follows two years of intensive negotiations with the German government, and contains "substantial improvements" over a draft proposal that had raised hackles among claimants and Jewish groups, according to Israel Miller, president of the Claims Conference.

The legislation has omitted a 25 per cent levy on the restitution that originally had been proposed.

If the individual has died, or the property belonged to Jewish organizations or communities dissolved by the Nazis, the law names the Claims Conference as the successor organization.

The money will come from German government funds.

Lamar visits Western Wall

Spector says that a visit to the Western Wall was discussed "only informally." But he acknowledges that Canadian government policy is "no different for the Western Wall than it is for any other sites in East Jerusalem or the occupied territories."

In the end, Shamgar simply took Lamer to the Western Wall without informing anyone.

But earlier parts of the trip were cancelled or changed. In defense to his host, Lamer decided not to go to Bethlehem at all since Shamgar, could not go with him. A compromise formula, proposed by th Canadian embassy, was used to enable Lamer to visit the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in the Old City of Jerusalem. He was accompanied by a Canadian, and met Shamgar at the church. "Shamgar was not pleased with this arrangement," says Cotler. "But he agreed to it so that his guest would not miss out on all the holy sites."

The reception that was to be held for Lamar at Ambassador Spector's residence was cancelled once Shamgar and other Israeli judges announced that they would not attend. Instead, Lamer held a dinner for the Israeli justices in Jerusalem.

Despite the controversy, Lamer's visit was considered successful and helped strengthen the growing ties between Canada's Supreme Court judges and their Israeli counterparts. Lamer invited Israeli Supreme Court President Shamgar and Deputy President Aharon Barak to visit Canada as his guests in September when the chief justices of the world convene in Ottawa. During his trip, Lamer attended a festive ceremony at which a graduate fellowship was inaugurated in his name. The human rights fellowship for study at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem is to be awarded to an outstanding Canadian law graduate. The Chief Justice also delivered a talk at the Israeli Supreme Court, entitled: "Canada's legal revolution: judging in the age of the charter of rights. " For Israel, now adopting its own human rights legislation, Canada is considered a role model and trailblazer in this area. Lamer is scheduled to return to Israel in December, together with three other Supreme Court of Canada judges, who will be attending the Canada-Israel Legal Cooperation Program's second conference on human rights.

Gaza police round up Islamic Jihad supporters

Abu Meidin said Abdullah Shami, Islamic Jihad's most prominent spokesman in Gaza, was among those arrested Sunday.

During Sunday's cabinet meeting, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin reportedly said PLO chief Yasser Arafat "is far from pulling out all the stops in taking action against Hamas and Islamic Jihad. He can do much more."

Rabin stressed that Israel must insist that he eradicate terrorism and take away the weapons belonging to the extremist organizations. "We don't have to run helter-skelter toward the Palestinians, but must consider every step very carefully," Rabin said.

Most of the terror attacks in which Israelis were killed this year were within the Green Line, in contrast to last year, when most fatalities took place in the territories, Rabin added.

Of the 66 Israelis killed so far this year, including those in the Netzarim attack, 48 died in attacks inside the Green Line. Only 14 of the 62 Israelis killed last year were killed inside the Green Line.

Rabin said he wanted to publicize these numbers to prove that while Arafat must do everything possible to stem attacks, this alone is insufficient. Israel must also do more, he said.

Abu Meidin said 85-90 per cent of the Palestinian population supports strong actions against extremists because of the loss of jobs in Israel and the attack on Arafat during the funeral of slain Islamic Jihad activist Hani Abed. "That was the red line for the Palestinian Authority."

Other Palestinian sources said Islamic Jihad's decision to strike an Israeli target in the Gaza Strip poses a serious challenge to Arafat.

By contrast, Hamas, which has committed even worse attacks recently, has avoided Arafat's wrath by attacking outside Gaza.

"Hamas is smarter, more clever, more pragmatic. They are looking for a piece of the cake," Abu Meidin said.

Hamas also has 10 times Islamic Jihad's support in Gaza.

Some of those arrested last Friday shot at police. Others were seen illegally firing weapons in the Friday parade honoring Abed's memory.

To make prosecutions easier, the Palestinian Authority will stress it is detaining the suspects in connection with the wounding of the six Palestinians, rather than for killing Israeli soldiers.

Blind Lodz leader dies

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LODZ — Dov Minc, the 86-year-old blind man who led the Jewish community of Lodz, Poland, for several years, died late last month.

He was buried at the Lodz Jewish cemetery, the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation in New York reported.

Minc was known for his devoted service to the Jewish community in Lodz, Poland's second largest city.

Although he became completely blind in his later years, Minc was able to supervise various religious and cultural activities of the community.

Today's Jewish community in Lodz is officially put at a few hundred, but "it is clear that a real number is much higher," said Rabbi Chaskel Besser, who directs the Lauder Foundation's program in Poland.

Prior to the Holocaust, Lodz was home to more than 202,000 Jews, many of them engaged in manufacturing. More than 378,000 Jews lived in the greater Lodz area.

Lodz's only remaining synagogue burned down in 1985 under unknown circumstances. Minc obtained funds from the Lauder Foundation to rebuild the shul.

Prospects for a new communal leader are good, Rabbi Besser reported. Lodz opened a Jewish youth club in August, and some activists in the Jewish community are emerging, he noted.

He said two men are being considered for Minc's position.

Canadiens' star lends a hand to Israeli hockey

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For obvious reasons, famed Montreal Canadiens defenceman Matthieu Schneider had no buses to catch or passes to intercept on a recent Sunday afternoon.

Instead, Schneider, one of a handful of Jewish players in the NHL, was over at the Samuel Moskovitch Arena in suburban Cote St. Luc, acting as a draw to get people to drop by and donate hockey equipment for Israel.

Schneider's appearance (he ended up signing some 300 autographs) was organized by the Canadian Friends of the Israeli Ice Hockey Association.

The association, launched four years ago by Montreal law students David Lisbona and Larry Markowitz, was founded to build grassroots involvement in and support for amateur hockey and figure skating in Israel.

The association also recently changed its name to Canadian Friends of Israeli Winter Sports so it could include speed skating and skiing.

Montreal Canadiens defenceman Matthieu Schneider (centre) is flanked by Larry Markowitz (left) and David Lisbona of the Canadian Friends of Israeli Winter Sports [Ben Shoob photo]

But Lisbona says his association, still rather loosely structured, has not strayed from its founding principles of making skating a pasttime for everyone and promoting hockey and figure-skating at a "high amateur level."

"Hockey pants, skates, shoulder pads ... We especially need goalie equipment and hockey sticks. Lots of hockey sticks," Lisbona says.

Israel has its own national hockey team (Team Israel), now playing in the World Cup C international division, and even sent a figure skater (Ukraine-born Misha Shmerkin) to the winter Olympics. (Shmerkin placed second in this month's Skate Canada competition in Red Deer, Alta. — see story on this page).

Montreal's own Tamara Ruby also competes as a figure skater internationally and trains in Metulla, one of Israel's five ice rinks (the others are in Haifa, Ramat Gan, Bat Yam and Jerusalem).

It is Metulla, in fact, that Schneider, an honorary director of Lisbona's and Markowitz's association, was supposed to visit this past summer as part of a Canadian Zionist Federation "Israel on Ice" tour.

That trip had to be put off, but Schneider told Lisbona he still hopes to go next summer, when a second, Olympic-sized rink will be completed in Metulla within the Canada Centre complex, a project of the United Israel Appeal of Canada.

The new rink, according to the association's newsletter, The Hockey Shtick, will become Israel's official training centre for figure skating and the host site for quyalifying rounds prior to the 1996 Pool C (hockey) Championships.

Interestingly, Lisbona's association is not the only Montreal group supporting hockey in Israel.

Another Montrealer, Leslie Levi, founded a local company that raises money for the Ice Hockey Federation of Israel — which oversees the operation of Team Israel, by selling hockey and leisure clothing — as well as hats, sweats, pins and pucks emblazoned with the Team Israel logo.

The same day Schneider was signing autographs at the arena, visitors could deposit equipment in one bin and buy equipment from Levi's company a few yards away.

Lisbona concedes that unlike Canada, the "hockey culture" is "not yet ingrained" in Israelis.

But that could change eventually, he said, by promoting it more and continuing to raise awareness.

Metulla mayor boosts hockey

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yossi Goldberg wore two hats last week, both with pride.

As the mayor of Metulla, Israel's northernmost settlement, a tough-sounding Goldberg displayed an unshakable view that Israel must not cede the Golan Heights to Syria before certain conditions are met — if ever.

But as the genial president of the Israeli Figure-Skating Association, he was positively beaming over the performance of his most famous member, Misha Shmerkin, who placed second at this month's Skate Canada competition in Red Deer, Alta.

The Odessa-born Shmerkin, 24, now a resident of Kiryat Shmona, boosted his standing to 14th in the world following a dazzling display of triple loops and axels. He was sandwiched between first-place finisher Elvis Stojko and another Canadian, Sebastien Britten, who placed third.

Yossi Goldberg

At one point, Shmerkin, a real crowd pleaser, skated onto the ice waving an Israeli flag. And for those who feel the photograph accompanying this article looks familiar, it's the one the United Jewish Appeal in Toronto used on its billboards this year to tug at donors' heartstrings.

At last winter's Olympic Games in Lillehammer, Norway, Shmerkin finished 16th, while at the world championships later, he placed 14th overall. Not bad for the grandson of a rabbi, who came to Israel in the 1991 wave of Soviet immigrants.

All Goldberg can do is shepp naches.

As for Shmerkin, he's blase. He told The CJN in a telephone interview that his performance in Red Deer was "okay," and that he's currently at work on even more razzle-dazzle moves for an upcoming competition in Japan. He's currently on a 10-month furlough from the Israeli Army.

While Shmerkin is clearly leader of the Israeli pack, there are plenty of skaters right behind him, Goldberg points out.

"There are now hundreds of kids skating in Israel and we have four figure-skating clubs," he says, adding proudly that the next conference of the International Figure-Skating Union will be held in Jerusalem in 1996.

The best Israeli women, Goldberg notes, excel, not at figure-skating, but at short-track speed skating. A Ukrainian emigree has good international prospects.

* * *

Try as he may, Goldberg can't avoid politics.

Metulla residents, like so many on the Golan Heights, feel "betrayed" by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's rumblings of a land-for-peace deal with Syria — despite election promises to the contrary — and rumors that Israeli Jews may have to live under Syrian sovereignty.

"I will never accept that any Jewish settlement will be on foreign territory," he says. "The majority [of Jewish residents] are not ready to leave. We want peace, and the first step is to get the Syrians out of Lebanon. Then we can negotiate."

Beliveau has fond memories of Israel

MONTREAL — Hockey legend Jean Beliveau says in his recently-translated memoirs that the two weeks he and his wife Elise spent in Israel in 1985 as part of the Canadian team at the Maccabiah Games was a highlight of his career.

"I can't remember anything in my professional career that matched marching into Ramat Gan stadium at the head of the Canadian contingent, with 60,000 spectators cheering us on," Beliveau relates in My Life in Hockey.

"Canada got an extra-special salute, and everyone felt this as we walked proudly behind our flag."

In the roughly three pages Beliveau devotes to Israel (he had also visited Canadian troops there in 1966), the Montreal Canadiens great recounts being invited to join the Canadian-Jewish team as honorary captain by Maccabi Canada leaders Gary Ulrich, Gordie Schwrtz and Eddy Wiltzer.

"It was a great trip for both Elise and me," writes Beliveau, "because we had lots of free time to visit the cities and nearby countryside.

"As a Canadian who lives in a country of a million lakes and hundreds of rivers, I was struck by the self-sufficiency of the Israeli kibbutz and the country's irrigation system," Beliveau relates.

"I wondered out loud how they could have turned the desert so green, and they showed me the giant de-salination plants."

Beliveau was particularly struck by the juxtaposition of the ancient and modern — including being shocked by a Coca-Cola sign at the 10th Station of the Cross in Jerusalem's Old City — and recalled one incident when he and his wife had to walk gingerly towards an antique shop in Jericho past a stone bridge that was thought to be mined.

Initially, a phalanx of soldiers held the Beliveaus back because of the risk.

But the their chauffeur convinced an officer that the honorary captain of the Canadian team would be safer inside the shop than near the bridge.

"...I could see him visualizing how much trouble would come down if we were blown to bits because he refused us shelter," Beliveau recounts.

Investing in Israel urged from within and abroad

'Israel's economy will grow reasonably well'

TORONTO — The 1994 nosedive taken by the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (TASE), in which the average share price dropped by about 60 per cent, was an anomaly, according to the president of a local financial service company.

"The stock market crashed for a variety of reasons which most people think are not going to be repeated," said David Baskin of Baskin Financial Services.

He was speaking at a recent panel discussion on investing in Israel, sponsored by the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Conregation continuing education committee, the Israel affairs committee of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and Mercaz-Canada.

TASE began its dramatic rise in 1993 as a result of North American investment, Baskin said. Israelis, seeing that there was money being made, bought mutual funds from banks. The banks were aggressively promoting the funds and offering loans to purchase them.

"Your taxi driver in Tel Aviv had opinions on the stock market. The bell boy at the Sheraton in Jerusalem tells you what stocks he's buying — classic signs of a market bubble," he said.

Fuelled by investment, the market kept on going up, but inevitably the bubble burst. Baskin attributed the sharp decline on the TASE in 1994 to the rise in U.S. interest rates and an investigation into trading irregularities by the Israeli Securities Commission, which resulted in the arrest of major stock speculators.

"People lost confidence in the integrity of the market; they saw interest rates rising — what happened? They did what all sensible people do. They phoned up their mutual funds and said I'd like to redeem my units in the mutual fund."

As a result, mutual fund managers sold stock, and this past spring TASE went into free-fall, said Baskin, "caused by massive liquidation of all mutual funds."

However, now that share prices are down, there are some bargains to be found. Baskin cited several stocks on TASE and a number of high capitalization stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange (NYSE) and NASDAQ. "Some of these companies are now trading at half the price that people were prepared to pay six or eight months ago."

He stressed anyone investing in Israeli stocks must recognize that they are dealing in a volitile market. "This is not investing in something that is going to go up a quarter of a point, down a quarter a point. These things fluctuate very widely."

Canadians, he added, can obtain Israeli stocks without an Israeli broker, either by buying stocks listed on North American exchanges, mainly on the NYSE and NASDAQ, or by purchasing mutual funds that invest in Israeli stocks.

Glenn Bowman, a partner with the chartered accountancy firm Soberman, Isenbaum and Colomby, predicted that the Israeli economy will grow "reasonably well" in the next decade if there are no major setbacks in the peace process. "Estimates are averaging, for the next five to 10 years, five to six per cent real growth. That is absolutely wonderful growth."

Israel's favorable economic prospects, he said, go hand in hand with the peace process and the country's improving international status.

"As a result," he said, "companies that would previously not consider setting up business in Israel are now looking at the opportunities."

He noted that Israel has been encouraging business investment from within and from abroad since 1959, with "subsidies, loan guarantees, tax benefits, and any other incentives that are needed to help provide an investor with a higher return on investment coupled with a lower overall risk."

Although State of Israel Bonds have traditionally been viewed as "a quasi-investment, quasi-heartstring tug," Charles Diamond, past executive vice-president of Canada Israel Securities, said that they are good investments offering high rates of interest.

"If you want a passive investment in Israel, the rates are right, and then bonds are something you really should consider."

Responding to a question from the audience, he said one of the downsides of certain Israel Bonds is that they are not fully liquid. They can be redeemed in Israel for shekels at any time, but bond owners must wait three to five years to cash them in here. In the future, he expects that State of Israel Bonds, which are now RRSP approved, will become fully liquid.

Audience member Shelley Jackson, who found the evening's discussion "very informative," said he was unaware that Israeli stocks are listed on New York exchanges.

Ehud Savion, the regional director of the Israel Aliyah Centre, said the information the panelists gave the audience is up-to-date and accurate.

Women in business topic of discussion

By SYLVIA PAPERNICK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Women cannot afford to remain financially disenfranchised.

This was the underlying message at a recent seminar, a joint program of the Dental Hygienists Division and Business & Professional Women's Network of United Jewish Appeal.

Guest speaker Bernice Miedzinski said that "as women, we have what it takes to be savvy money managers." All that is needed is education.

An investment educator, Miedzinski has a particular interest in financial education for women. As the founder and president of Money Skills, a company which designs and delivers seminars on a wide variety of financial topics, she provides investment education for both individual investors and professionals in the financial services industry.

Miedzinski is a trained consultant and a fellow of the Canadian Securities Institute. Her aim is to provide women with the tools to make good financial decisions. "If we are ignorant, it has nothing to do with our ability," she noted.

Referring to a Money Magazine survey published in June 1992, Miedzinski said women possess certain positive skills for making sound financial investment decisions.

Women are eager to ask questions when dealing with unfamiliar materials; they seek help when necessary; and women research and "do their homework," in order to avoid risk.

Women also generally set goals and tend to be fairly focused. Psychologists say that most of our attitudes, values and phobias relating to money come from either adapting to or rejecting our parents' attitudes.

She said the best way to purchase stocks is to "go with your gut." A good source for making a sound investment is the daily newspaper. Try to speculate on a company's growth potential over the next five to 10 years. Making active observations of the latest trends can also help. She warned people to be wary though of succumbing to "analysis paralysis."

She concluded, "Decide you are the person in control of your financial success, and take action."

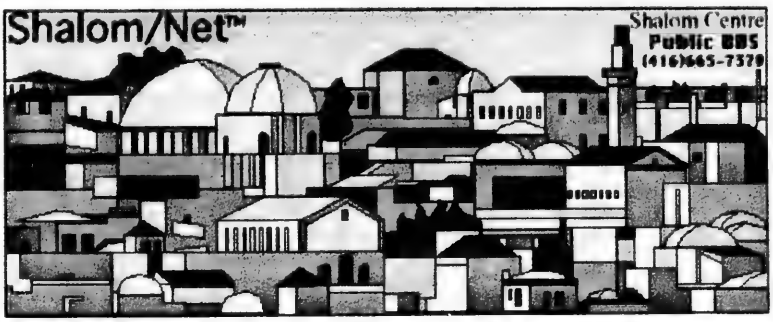
Jewish internet a wealth of information

By SYLVIA PAPERNICK
Special to The CJN



TORONTO — Toronto's Jewish community has entered a new dimension of cyberspace with a new bulletin board system, Shalom/Net, which formed last July.

This non-profit, community-oriented internet provides a wealth of information, with topics covering a wide spectrum of Jewish and secular life. As its name suggests, Shalom/Net is open to anyone of good will. Only racist and neo-Nazis are not permitted to participate in or log on to this information highway.

Conceived and founded by Joel Shuster, Yehuda Neve-Bar, Dr. William Goodman and Gordon Quinn, it runs on SoftArc software and is accessible to anyone with any kind of computer and a modem, whether Windows, Macintosh or DOS based. It is the only Jewish bulletin board system that has a graphical interface.

"We want something that is a link, not only within the Jewish community but also for the Jewish community and the rest of cyberspace," explains Shuster. Plans are afoot to hook up Shalom/Net with other Jewish communities, in Canada and beyond.

A good starting point for the novice to electronic mail as well as seasoned surfers, Shalom/Net is often regarded as more of an information driveway than a highway.

"People that make mistakes here are more easily forgiven," says Shuster. "It's the people that make the system. One of the fastest growing segments of the computer market are retirees who're getting computers."

The list of conferences or subjects that one can peruse include a Yiddish conference, congregations, Middle East peace, Torah study, the shouk (market), literary interest, religious services, Holocaust, Israel events, and news (Israeli and local).

With the recent peace agreement between Israel and Jordan, one correspondent sent a message over the system: "Can Shalom/Nets in Amman and Jerusalem be far behind?"

Secular conferences include real estate, automobiles, camping and hiking, and other recreational interests. Goodman compares the internet to "an electronic extension of The Canadian Jewish News."

There is a personals conference, which is an excellent means of hooking up with someone who shares your interest in computers. For example: "Shul Gabbai, 36; I take out Torah Saturday morning, would like to take you out Saturday night."

Singles can log on anonymously and can write on behalf of themselves or someone else. Shalom/Net is both social and educational.

What makes Shalom/Net particularly Jewish? Torah study, Middle East news and the fact that in the travel section, Israel is always listed ahead of other destinations.

Rabbi Philip Scheim of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, a supporter of and contributer to Shalom/Net, said, "Community bulletin boards are a way of reaching hundreds if not thousands of Jews who may not link up with any of the mainstream organizations. In particular, they are outstanding vehicles to stimulate Jewish interest in young members of our community."

They are also an appealing way to obtain information; for example, on-line, one might learn how to light the Chanukah lights in the proper order.

Users must log on under their own name, address and phone number, so that their identity can be verified. New registrants are welcomed in Hebrew, addressed as chaver or chavera (friend) and are allowed 30 minutes on the system on a daily basis at no charge.

The recommended contribution is a $36 donation per year to help maintain the system with a host computer, phone lines, and specially licensed software.

Volunteers to help run the system are welcome. For those who do not have a modem, the on-line angel can be reached at (416) 663-4355; the number to dial on-line is (416) 665-7379.

Currently 300 people are on-line, but there is a capacity for about 900 more.

This is the first story in The Canadian Jewish News published simultaneously in Shalom/Net.

A possible bank sale

JERUSALEM — Bank Hapoalim has signed an agreement in principle to sell Bank Hapoalim (Canada), a fully-owned subsidiary, to Republic National Bank of New York, Hapoalim announced recently.

Republic National Bank of New York, controlled by Edmond Safra, plans to merge Bank Hapoalim (Canada) into its business activities in Canada.

A bank spokesman refused to reveal terms of the agreement but said Republic National Bank is in the process of evaluating the Canadian subsidiary.

A new source of charity dollars

TORONTO — Life insurance is becoming a new source for charitable donations, according to Toronto broker David Brown.

He recently offered members of United Jewish Appeal's Insurance Division a quick course on a fund-raising solution that "has just scratched the surface."

A couple signs a life insurance policy for a fixed amount and transfers it to the charity of their choice. When both partners die, the charity is the beneficiary and receives the amount stipulated in the policy.

"It is within the realm of most people," said Brown. Not only that, but tax savings are available as well. The couple taking out the policy reimburse their designated charity for the premiums by means of a tax-deductible donation.

The organization at the policy's receiving end could yield $100,000 for premiums as low as $300 a year, depending on the age of the individuals involved. However, every policy is individually prepared to match the needs of both donor and recipient.

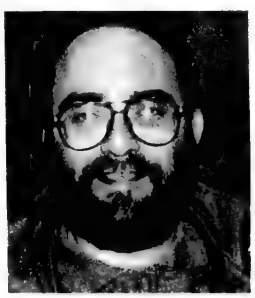
"There's no such thing as an eccentric insurance policy," said Brown. "You can do anything you want."

Brown strongly counsels clients not to substitute life insurance policies for their annual donations to UJA. "We're very clear that this is above and beyond their regular gift," he says.

If life insurance is such an effective funding source for non-profit organizations, why isn't there a stampede to take advantage of it?

"Many organizations don't even know about it," responds Brown, whose company, Al G. Brown & Associates, is considered one of Canada's top specialists in the field.

This year alone, Brown's firm transferred over $250,000 in life insurance proceeds to designated non-profit entities.



David Brown

For Brown, transferring insurance policies into tzedakah is more than merely business. He told his UJA colleagues it's a matter of "fulfilling dreams and granting wishes."

"When we approach a client on behalf of a charity, we don't talk about life insurance. We talk about life."

Municipal Trust
The Hometown Alternative To Big City Banks

Everywhere you turn, businesses of all types are espousing their commitment to service. For more than 20 years, Municipal Trust has been quietly providing the kind of service customers want... and deserve. No fanfare, no huge advertising campain, just great service day after day. With 29 branches across Ontario, and over $1.2 billion dollars in assets, Municipal Trust has earned the reputation of being the "hometown alternative to big city banks."

Now, with a new full service branch in North York (Bathurst & Wilson), customers are realizing the advantages of dealing with the "hometown alternative." According to Mr. Tzvi Hirschman, owner of Goldstein Meats, "I've always preferred to deal with smaller financial institutions. They provide a lot more personal service than the big city banks."

In fact, Municipal Trust was the first financial institution to offer a $5 guarantee. Municipal Trust will give you $5 on the spot...

- If you are not treated with courtesy and respect
- If you wait more than 5 minutes in line
- If you find an error in your statement or passbook
- If you don't hear back from us within 24 hours about your loan application

"Municipal Trust provides excellent service," says Mr. Hirschman. "They express individual care, possess a real knowledge and understanding of my account and its history and are sensitive to the needs of small business. I would recommend Municipal Trust to anyone who appreciates a more personal approach to banking."

Recent changes made to the Loan & Trust Corporations Act has allowed Municipal Trust to expand its presence in the commercial lending arena by increasing the amount of financing available to small businesses and commercial loans. According to Paul McFeeters, President and Chief Operating Officer of Municipal Trust, "Our trust company is particularly well-positioned to help meet the financing needs of small to medium-sized businesses throughout Ontario's smaller cities and towns where our 29 branches are located."

To assist with this endeavour, Mr. Mike Collins recently joined Municipal Trust as a commercial underwriter, operating out of the North York branch. Bringing over 20 years of industry experience to the table, Mr. Collins is responsible for financing commercial properties within the Toronto area, as well as small business financing.

Municipal Trust also takes pride in its services to customers aged 50 and better. In 1975 Municipal Trust introduced the Golden Circle account and became one of the first financial institutions to focus on financial services for the mature, senior market. Today, thousands of customers aged 50 and better are part of the Golden Circle Club which provides a variety of special services and discounts.

The Villas of 760 please meticulous buyers

Today, when making a major purchase such as a home, people choose with an eye to quality and the long term. The Villas of 760 are designed and built to meet the requirements of even the most meticulous buyer. Solid construction, easy maintenance, and the safety, comfort and decorative tastes of the home owner have all been treated as essentials.

There are three models, the Monte Carlo, the Monaco and the Cannes. All are solidly built of clay brick. Soldier coursing, brick arches and keystones give the Villas elegant, dignified exteriors which harmonize with the permanence and solidity of their construction.

Other exterior features include pre-finished maintenance-free aluminum soffit, fascia, eavestrough and downspouts. Every house also has a balcony in front, and an external connection for a gas barbecue.

The front door is fitted with a brass grip set, house number, coach lamp, door bell with electric chime, and deadbolt lock. In addition, it has a rough-in for a security system. There are casement or fixed thermal windows in front, and a pre-cast concrete slab and paved walkway to the entrance.

Every Villa has its own private garage and paved driveway in front. In all models, there is a tap in the garage. The basements, located at street level next the garage, have poured concrete walls; there is a powder room and storage area in each basement, as well as an inside stairway to the main floor.

The elegance and solidity of the exterior is matched within the house. The interior trim features brass finish hardware. There are Series 800 doors in finished areas, and Colonial baseboards with quarter-round in all tiled areas. All the main floor archways are trimmed. For floor areas, the vendor offers a selection of quality 35-ounce broadloom, and a choice of ceramic tile in kitchen, entrance foyer, main bath and powder room.

In the kitchen, there is luminous overhead lighting. For cabinet styles and counter tops, the buyer may select a variety from vendor's samples. The stove area is equipped with an overhead exhaust fan. The sink is double stainless steel, with a single-lever faucet and rough-in plumbing for an automatic dishwasher.

All models have two bathrooms plus a powder room. The vendor offers a selection of ceramic wall bathroom tile, and a choice of vanity cabinets and counter tops to form a pleasing contrast with the fixtures, which are all white.

The vanities have sinks with single-lever taps; also, beside every vanity, there are electrical outlets for small appliances such as razors. Over the mirrors in powder room, main bath and ensuite bath, there is vanity strip lighting.

In the unfinished area of each basement, there is a circuit breaker type electrical panel with 100 amp service, and two outlets under the panel. All wiring is installed in accordance with Ontario Hydro standards, with heavy-duty wiring and receptacles for stoves, refrigerators and dryers. The bedroom light fixtures are in the ceilings. All switches and receptacles are white.

Both safety and energy conservation have influenced the design of the Villas. Safety features include a smoke detector in the upper hallway. Heating and air conditioning are individually controlled; gas and hydro are individually metred.

Each Villa has a mid-efficiency forced air, gas-fired and gas-heated integrated hot water system, and a hot-water tank with a rental contract from Consumer's Gas.The water pipes are copper. There is R19 insulation in the exterior walls, R32 in the roof and R12 in the basement. For convenience, the thermostat is located centrally on the main floor.

The interior walls and trim will be painted with two coats of off-white premium quality latex paint. Except for the kitchen, laundry room, washrooms and basement, all ceilings are stippled in white.

Patti Stren's motto: 'Never give up'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — She calls herself "child-like." She talks to an interviewer sprawled across the bed in her hotel room. She rapsodizes over her husband, a radiation oncologist who sends her love notes by fax. And she tells children to never give up their dreams.

Altogether, interviewing Patti Stren, Brantford-born children's author, artist and, most recently, textile artist, is a total delight.

Stren, who now lives and works in New York, was in Toronto to publicize her new book For Sale: One Brother.

Published by Disney in the United States and by Scholastic Press in Canada, For Sale: One Brother is the story of Molly, who, exasperated by the demands, nudging and just plain existence of her little brother David decides to sell him (or rent him, if necessary).

A sign in the apartment laundry room, offering him for sale, complete with "good teeth" and "a winning smile" and his toy worm, "price negotiable" but "no reasonable offer refused," and with free delivery, actually brings several offers — until retribution appears, in the form of her mother.

Anyone with siblings, or who has children who have siblings, will relate to this story. Stren says that one child sent her a note telling about adding the newest addition to the family to the garage sale.

The book is in some measure autobiographical. She and her older brother David fought constantly, she remembers, although in her case she was the younger child.

On the other hand, she says, "He knew I was unique when no one else ever did." In fact, David, a systems analyst, published her first book.

She talks freely about the years when she felt she wasn't very pretty or very smart or very thin, when her work wasn't appreciated.

"I know what it's like to get an A in school, but I also know what it's like to do so badly in Math that the teacher said in front of the whole class that I should have cheated."

When she talks to children, and that is something she likes to do, she tells them not to tease others who don't seem to measure up. "I tell them those are the kids who will turn out to be the best."

She tells them to keep their dreams when other people, and even a voice inside yourself, tell you something can't be done. "Never give up."

Her books mirror this hopeful attitude. One of her earliest, Hug Me, is about Eliot, a porcupine who desperately wants someone to hug. I'm Only Afraid of the Dark at Night tells the story of Harold Tribune (yes, that's really his name) an owl who is afraid of the dark. And I Was a 15-Year-Old Blimp is about a teenage girl facing those awful adolescent years with the added burden of being overweight.

Patti Stren, surrounded by some of her whimsical rubber stamps and drawings. [Ruth Lubka photo]

Whimsical

All are vulnerable — but because they never stop trying or give up hope, things work out well for them.

"You have to be your own hero," she likes to say. If that touches only one kid, she says, that's fine.

Stren is branching out into new territory, artistically speaking. Her whimsical rubber stamp patterns, for sale at Great Impressions on Queens Quay West, are featured in For Sale: One Brother. Her cartoons are used on ties and scarves by designer Nicole Miller, and she is negotiating with a clothing line to have her own line of "flirty, romantic clothes."

A self-declared passionate supporter of causes, she is donating part of the proceeds of For Sale: One Brother to Mothers Against Drunk Driving, in memory of a young doctor killed by on her way to answer an emergency call.

She wants to make a difference, and her books teach children that they can make a difference, too.

The Abuse Excuse by Alan M. Dershowitz, Little, Brown & Co. $29.95

Are we responsible for our behavior? Do we still believe in individual responsibility? Are we to be governed by our passions or by the rule of law?

Alan Dershowitz, renowned defence lawyer and professor at the Harvard Law School, is sure that criminals are literally getting away with murder. Courts of law and much of public opinion have been seduced by the notion that man and women are victims of forces beyond their control. The accused admit that they committed acts of violence, but claim that they couldn't help themselves. This "Abuse Excuse" argument includes abused child syndrome, battered wife syndrome, black rage, repressed memory syndrome, prozac defence, drug or alcoholic abuse — and more than twenty others.

To the more usual excuses, Dershowitz adds those that concern government corruption, as well as those offered by radical leftists, feminists, ethnic minorities and others who perceive themselves as victims of long-term abuse by "the system." He discusses cases involving O. J. Simpson, Tonya Harding, Woody Allen, Lorena Bobbitt, the Menendez Brothers and John Demjanjuk.

Jonathan Pollard, the American who pleaded guilty to spying for Israel has now served longer in prison than any other American in history convicted of spying for an ally. This is unjust, comments the author, in light of the plea bargain the government had struck with Pollard. In addition, the government continues to play fast and loose with the facts in the case and insists that many of them are classified.

Dershowitz writes that all the material used to keep Pollard in jail should now be declassified so that the public can determine for itself the actual extent of his crime.

"I am convinced that a full, fair and open review of the facts will lead to the conclusion that the information provided by Pollard to Israel was largely tactical and regional rather than global and strategic... Jonathan Pollard has more than paid his debt to society for engaging in an act of civil disobedience calculated to save innocent lives."

Louis Farrakan, the black Muslim leader is accused of using the "scapegoat excuse" to utter lies about Jews. To claim that 75 per cent of the slaves in the South were owned by Jews is patently absurd since Jews were only one-fifth of one per cent of the population at the time of the Civil War. Recent scholarly research indicates that Jews owned less than one per cent of slaves. Farrakan and his Nation of Islam are focusing black rage and frustration on Jews, an historic target — for which there is no valid excuse.

Several years ago, reveals the author, a group of women students threatened to charge him with sexual harassment because, in their view, he spent too much time in his classes discussing false charges of rape. A hypersensitive student can bring a charge of sexual harassment, and no matter how unfounded, it can be a career-ender, especially for an untenured teacher.

"If a student disagrees with a professor's statements, she has ample opportunity to respond, rebut, picket, even heckle. But there is no place in a university setting — or anywhere else — for censorship of hostile ideas."

Of course, acknowledges the author, a criminal justice system must reflect differences in degrees of guilt. Judges should take such differences into account in imposing sentences, and jurors should be presented with an array of verdicts representing different degrees of culpability. "But, we must stop making excuses and start taking responsibility. What is at stake is far more than the punishment of criminals and deterrence of crime. It is the very nature of our experiment with democracy."

As always, Dershowitz is forthright, cogent, clear and provocative.

EYE ON ARTS

BY BILL GLADSTONE

Poor Mrs. Yoshke Furmanovsky! In 1877, this dutiful wife of a humble Polish tailor found her way to paradise blocked by, of all things, a potato kugel with supernatural powers.

Strange as it sounds, this is the premise of an uproariously funny domestic tale, Tum Gan Eden, (A Taste of Paradise) by Toronto storyteller Michael Wex. To judge from the audience's reaction of near-hysterical laughter for about half an hour, Wex's tale may be deemed an outstanding highlight of the Jewish Storytelling Festival that took place recently in Toronto.

Wearing a black suit and the trace of an impish grin, the diminutive, 40-year-old monologuist stands demurely on stage as he begins to slay his listeners with the first words out of his mouth. His droll, singularly monotonous delivery serves only to heighten the hilarity of the language, which is liberally sprinkled with Yiddish. "I'm not entirely conscious of my tone," he says. "I told a story in Kingston on Monday, and afterwards people were asking, 'What's his real voice like?' I thought that was my real voice."

Judith Black was also a performer at the Jewish Storytelling Festival. [Morris Miller photo]

Wex's potato kugel has carried him to Europe and even helped get him a mention in the New York Times. He has told the story hundreds of times to audiences across Canada and the United States. Three weeks ago, he appeared (with other performers) at Symphony Space, a New York club at Broadway and 95th Street.

"Basically, the kugel story has become my meal ticket," he says. "I went through a period where I said, 'I refuse to tell this anymore' — and rapidly discovered that I wasn't getting any work."

Preferring not to divulge too many details of the tale, Wex says that "people seem to like it either because it conforms to tradition or because it negates tradition, depending on how you see it." When asked to sum up its essence, he shrugs to indicate that he can answer the question only with another question.

"What's it about? The aphrodisiac power of potatoes?" His eyebrows furrow as he considers the matter further. Then he solemnly declares: "It's about the role of a potato kugel in the preservation of the Jewish people."

Wex says he composed the story in a fit of pique in 1983, after his more racy submissions to a folktale festival in which he had been invited to participate were rejected as unsuitable. "I basically wrote it in one day. From somewhere, the idea of a talking kugel came to me, and I remember that I wrote the first half and then stopped and asked myself, 'Okay, what can happen now? What can a talking kugel do?' I did it so quickly I didn't have time to think. I had less than a week to write it and learn it."

Born in Lethbridge, Wex was raised in a Yiddish-speaking household that moved several times between Alberta and the largely Jewish area, Bathurst Manor in north Toronto. After studying English literature at university, he taught Yiddish at the University of Toronto for awhile, then turned to writing and storytelling full-time. He is married to Reena Zeidman, the head of Jewish studies at Queen's University in Kingston.

"It wasn't until I was in my 20s that I had any interest in Yiddish," he recalls. "Before then, I was embarrassed by it — there's nothing worse than being out with your parents and they begin yelling at you in Yiddish. But eventually I realized what an incredible advantage I had."

Wex is the author of Shlepping the Exile (Mosaic Press, 1990), a spicy, adult novel that contains a version of the innocent kugel story. It's available for $14.95 at numerous bookstores around Toronto. A tape is also available.

He is currently working on a second novel and a set of monologues dealing with Yiddish-speaking characters living in Paris between the wars. "How do you deal with World War II and make it funny?" he asks, shrugging. "This is the challenge I've set for myself."

Understudy's dream comes true

By PAULA CITRON
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When the Toronto production of Andrew Lloyd Webber's The Phantom of the Opera first opened at the Pantages Theatre five years ago, Glenda Balkan was a member of the ensemble and the second understudy for the role of opera singer Carlotta Guidicelli.

She only got to perform if the lead, the alternate and the first understudy became ill.

Since September, the Montreal-born soprano has been playing the coveted role of Christine Daaé, the heroine of the long-running mega-musical.

Glenda Balkan

Balkan was the first singer in any of the Phantom companies to make the transition from Carlotta to Christine. In fact, she was the first singer to actually perform both roles at the same time, which is something of a feat.

The role of Carlotta is usually given to a coloratura soprano who has very high notes and a flexible voice capable of florid runs and trills; Christine is generally sung by a lyric soprano.

It was Garth Drabinsky who first had Balkan sing the star role. "One night, by a fluke, none of the leads was performing because of illness or other reasons," says Balkan, "and we heard that Garth was coming to check out the show. After, he came backstage and told me he had a hunch about me.

"A few weeks later, I was asked to audition for Christine and my first reaction was that I was too old. But even though I was the Carlotta alternate at the time, they offered me the Christine understudy, and a few months later, I became the Christine alternate.

"Because alternates are guaranteed a certain number of performances, I was actually playing both roles several times in the same week... One night, I actually had to look down at my skirt to remember which part I was singing!"

Balkan is from a family who ran a kosher-style restaurant that was an historic fixture in Montreal for over a half a century.

"There's a family legend that says my grandfather started Balkan's Restaurant in 1929 because he didn't have much to do, so he bought a Chinese restaurant with a thousand dollars that he had saved up. He got my grandmother to do the cooking and they lived upstairs... Eventually my father and uncle took over Balkan's and ran it until my grandfather died. We were a real restaurant family."

The soprano inherited her interest in music from her father, who wanted to become a concert pianist. As a child she studied dance and played the guitar and piano, but she did not start formal voice training until she was 18. She took a music degree at McGill University because, she says, "Getting out on stage and performing seemed right."

After studying in Europe, she returned to perform in Montreal and she did a stint in New York.

Balkan and her husband moved to Toronto in 1986, and the singer put her career on hold to devote herself to her daughter.

By 1988, her marriage was over and she needed to support herself and Katie, then 2, and began performing again.

She fell into Phantom almost by accident.

"Even though people were telling me I should try out," she says, "I wasn't planning to audition for the show because I was busy at other jobs."

In looking back over her career, Balkan, 40, admits that Phantom has been the turning point in her life and considers herself lucky to have been given the opportunity to sing in the show.

London's classic attractions and new discoveries

By PHYLLIS KRASILOVSKY
Special to The CJN

LONDON — It is always a pleasure to return to London, where the classic attractions are augmented by new discoveries each time.

On a recent visit, my 13th, I took my first 1½ hour Regent's Canal trip. We glided past houseboats with colorful flowerboxes, the gardens of waterside mansions, and joggers and strollers who shout greetings.

We also passed the back of the London Zoo, spying animals like the giraffes and llamas with their long necks. On the opposite bank, a mammoth netted tent is the zoo's aviary. It is astir with colorful birds.

The final stop on the canal ride is Camden Town, an area of flea markets and antique stores, where one can disembark or remain on board for the return trip to Little Venice.

Another waterway to discover is the Thames, with a choice of a short run on a catamaran cruise to the Tower Bridge and the infamous Tower of London, or to Greenwich. One feels for Anne Boleyn and the Earl of Essex who, condemned to die, arrived by the river and entered the Tower through the Traitor's Gate.

Cozy pubs

Greenwich is home to the impressive lawns and buildings of the Royal Naval Academy, as well as the observatory built on the zero meridian. The observatory and a museum are open to the public and one can lunch in a choice of cozy pubs near the waterfront.

A comparatively new art gallery is the Courthaud Institute Galleries which is housed in the beautiful rooms of what was once Somerset House. There are seven centuries of European paintings from Botticelli to Sutherland, but the impressionists are particularly fine. A visit to the Galleries can be nicely combined with a walk along the Thames through the Embankment Gardens, where a full dress band plays each afternoon.

There's almost always something new at the Royal Academy, and now they've got an artsy, if clattering, cafeteria worthy of note. In warmer months though, a lunchtime sojourn might be preferable down the street at the St. James Church cafeteria. There are frequent concerts and exhibitions there.

Finally, an old landmark, the Westbury Hotel of the Trusthouse Forte chain, has newly furbished rooms. Take tea in its library, complete with fireplace and deep armchairs. The Bond Street Westbury is surrounded by elegant shops and is a short walk from the (free) Museum of Mankind, well worth a good look.

Update on Surfside, Fla.: Surfside, the ocean-front community along Collins Avenue between 88th to 96th Streets in Dade County, just above Miami Beach, features 15 low-rise hotels and motels and a newly revamped 400-foot-wide golden beach.

The Surfside Tourist Board reports that the Baymar Ocean Resort (formerly the Seabrook) has recently undergone a massive modernization, and the Palms has been improved and become affiliated with the Holiday Inn chain. The Beekman, Rodney, 8801 Apartments, Coronado and Hilyard have also been upgraded.

Daily rack rates (in U.S. dollars) from December 15 to April 15 are: Beekman, $115 to $225; Coronado $59 to $90; Holiday Inn Palms $120 to $140; Rodney, $56 to $89; Baymar, $58 to $125; Hilyard, $56 to $92; and 8801 Apartments, $99 to $150.

"Surfside has not been touched by South Florida's crime wave, being 20 miles from the sites of the occurrences," a press release reports, "The tranquil community is well patrolled with one policeman for every 200 persons as opposed to larger cities where the ratio is one to 300."

Florida Safety Improvements: After several well-publicized incidents in which visitors were attacked along the highway, Florida tourism officials have clearly marked main highway routes for tourists with large orange sunburst emblems.

Travelers are advised not to venture into lanes without the new sunburst logo unless they are familiar with the area or have received specific instructions about driving there.

Some 400 new road signs have also been installed as part of the safety program, which is budgeted at $3 million. As well, the Greater Miami Convention and Visitors Bureau is issuing new road maps that highlight the main roads travelers need to use to reach principal destinations.

Car Travel Safety Tips: When travelling by car in any unknown terrain, especially in or around large cities, it's always wise to play it safe.

- Carry a portable cellular phone, if you can, and make sure you have precise directions to your destination. Stop only in well-lit public areas. Drive to a crowded area if you think you're being followed.
- Keep car doors and windows locked when travelling. Stay inside the vehicle and honk the horn if someone is attempting to intimidate you.
- Do not leave valuables in your car.

As part of Sea World of Florida's newest attraction, Wild Arctic, guests will come face-to-face with polar bears and other creatures of the Arctic. Shown here is an artist's rendering of the polar bear exhibit.

A thrilling Arctic adventure

ORLANDO, FL — Sea World of Florida recently announced the addition of Wild Arctic, a thrilling Arctic adventure which will debut by the end of May 1955.

The multi-faceted attraction is the park's most ambitious project in its 20-year history, and the biggest undertaking in the history of any Anheuser-Busch theme park. The Arctic adventure combines a thrilling flight over the frozen North and real-life encounters with the animals that live there.

"The Arctic remains a mystery to most," says William A. Davis, executive vice-president and general manager. "Remote and largely inaccessible, it is assumed to be a frozen desert. In actuality, it is a vast, ever-changing ocean, teeming with life and closely linked to the rest of the planet. As part of Sea World's continuing commitment to offer our guests unique experiences with marine life, we are bringing the sights, sounds and sensations of the Arctic to Central Florida.

"We believe that what the public understands, it will protect," he adds. "It is our hope that introducing guests to the marine life of the Arctic will elicit a concern for environmental issues that are impacting this beautiful and fragile area."

Combining a high-definition adventure film with high-powered flight simulator technology, the adventure begins aboard the jet helicopter, Borealis or Snow Dog, kicking up cold dry snow at takeoff, in a race to outrun an approaching storm. Passengers are enveloped in the beauty, exhilaration and danger of Arctic exploration. Panoramas are breathtaking, but the trip is far from tranquil. High anxiety ensues when passengers encounter dangerous Arctic hazards prior to being delivered safely at the research base before the weather closes in.

Stepping from the helicopter, guests enter Base Station Wild Arctic through a chilly passageway which gives way to a frozen wonderland with ice walls nearly a half-inch thick. Seals lie on the ice, blinking a welcome at new arrivals. In the water, a white whale — a beluga — surfaces.

Here, the experience continues. Guests explore Base Station Wild Arctic which was built by modern scientists around the creaky hull of a 150-year-old British exploration ship.

Record animal behavior

The ship provides a unique vantage point for viewing Arctic sea life. Guests view polar bears, walruses, beluga whales and seals from both above and below water, as the animals forage for food, dive, swim and interact with Base Station workers. The realistic habitats provide insight into the animals' natural behaviors and environments. Brisk 10C water temperatures are suitable for polar bears and salmon alike.

Guests' exploration is enhanced by real-time computer communiques and interaction with research base "scientists." Monitors transmit ongoing reports from field researchers and radio tracking devices. Guests participate in record gathering by using touch screens to record animal behavior. Their data becomes part of Sea World's behavioral studies records.

Children participate in learning that is fun. They explore polar bear dens, log on to the ArcticNET or pop their heads through openings in a simulated ice floe — just as they saw the harbor seals doing moments before.

CAPTIVATING LESSON

With sandtiger and Pacific blacktip sharks cruising overhead, Sea World Education instructor Mile Brosas displays a set of shark jaws to a group of students. The San Diego park brings marine life education to more than 250,000 students annually.

CHANUKAH GIFTS

Distinctive folk art makes a great gift

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Those colorful, hand-painted wooden nesting dolls have been made by generations of Russian artists, but the inspiration is purely Japanese.

Before the 19th century, Japanese artists produced stackable gods for religious purposes. In 1830 a Japanese visitor presented a Russian nobleman with a set. A peasant, who had several daughters, saw the figures and liked them so much that he copied the idea and substituted dolls for the gods.

Sometime at the end of the 19th century, nesting dolls began appearing at Russian craft fairs and quickly gained popularity. Today Matrioshka dolls — named for the area in which they were first made — reflect the distinctive folk art of the regions in which they are now crafted.

Travelling through those regions, Anne Emonson of Russia House was overwhelmed by the variety of Matrioshka dolls she saw. "There are so many dolls out on the market," she said.

Russia House, a Canadian importer and distributor of Russian crafts, ended up selecting three basic styles — floral, abstract and fairy tale motifs — for the North American market.

The exquisite and intricately dolls are hand-painted by Russian artists in rich colors.

The fairy tale dolls, based on Russian and European fairy tales, tell the story of obstacles faced by a young man and woman on the road to true love. Individual dolls depict a different aspect of the story.

Each of the sets is unique. None are painted exactly alike and details vary. Artists make only about eight or nine sets from a single mold.

Specialty Matrioshkas imported by Russia House include a line of political dolls, featuring Russian political leaders from Lenin to Yeltsin. "They tend to be different," Emonson said, "as each artist has their own rendition of what they perceive the leaders to look like."

Five-piece doll sets have a suggested retail prices of $49.95, while larger sets cost anywhere from $89.95 to $99.95. The political dolls retail at $79.95.

There is a Matrioshka doll book ($30) for anyone who wants to learn about the designs painted on the dolls. Cheerful hand-painted Matrioshka tea cosies sell for $19.95.

Russia House also imports the traditional Russian Bogorodsky toy. When set into motion, these toys — mainly bears — are capable of a range of activities including riding a bike, playing the piano, fishing and taking a shower. Named after a region near Moscow in which they are made, the Bogorodsky toys are carved from wood.

"With people's desire for natural products," Emonson said, "the wood toys are a big seller."

She recommends the toy, a favorite with adults, for children over nine as young children may not have the hand-eye coordination required to activate the toy. Bogorodsky toys retail for about $16.

There are lacquered brooches (from $14.95 to $89.95 retail) with floral and folklore motifs, and theatre glasses for $29.95. "We're selling to a number of theatres and they think they're wonderful," Emonson said. A telescope at 20 times magnification costs $46.95 and one at 10 times magnification sells for $34.95.

Russia House is a subsidiary of The Winchester Group, formed seven years ago to do business with the former Soviet Union.

Two years ago, after visiting Russia several times, Emonson had put together a line of products to start Russia House. Currently more than 325 retail stores in North America, mainly in Canada, carry Russia House merchandise.

The company has a native Russian representative in Moscow, and without him, Emonson says it would be impossible to run an exporting business. Laws and regulations there change almost on a daily basis, she explained, and you need someone to guide you through the maze.

Even contacting a potential supplier can be a major hurdle. Emonson has been to Russia more than a dozen times and has yet to see a telephone book.

For information about Russia House merchandise, call 905-479-9016.

Canadian soapstone sculptures

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Soapstone carvings by two Quebec artists have found their way into some of the world's best homes.

Queen Elizabeth has had one since 1978, and Brian Mulroney gave Margaret Thatcher one when she retired as Britain's prime minister.

Prince Charles and Princess Di were given a soapstone bear by Pierre Trudeau as a wedding gift.

The sculptures are produced by a family living in Quebec's Eastern Townships. Mark Parkinson, 65, and his 35-year-old son Ross do the carving, while Mark's wife Betty supervises the polishing. The high polish brings out the beautiful grain of the soapstone.

"The carvings are very representational of nature and the Innuit way of life," said the family's agent, Sara Shabsove of Ottawa.

The artists carve birds and animals such as bears, beavers, Canada geese, ducks, loons, penguins, owls and seals. Hunters, men ice-fishing, a woman playing a drum and other figures illustrate the Innuit lifestyle. Prices range from $18 for a bird to $1,400 for a boat scene.

Shabsove became the Parkinsons' exclusive agent after seeing Mark's work at a craft show in 1977. She asked to become his agent, and when she telephoned him a few months later was told that he thought she had been joking.

It was no joke. Shabsove immediately took over. "It kind of started as a lark at first, but it's a viable business," she said.

Before meeting Mark, Shabsove was a "plantscaper," decorating homes with plants under the name Green Schemes Consultants Limited. When she opened her art business, she continued to operate with the same company name.

Shabsove recently branched out, becoming the agent for two British Columbia native artists: Ben Houstie, a Haida-style painter who trained with the well-known artist Bill Reid, and Jerry Whitehead, who Shabsove called the "Rembrandt of Indian art." She acquired paintings from both artists and had some of their works put on T-shirts.

To receive a Green Schemes catalogue or to make an appointment to visit the warehouse, call (613) 247-9131.

Chanukah Gifts

A flowering greeting card

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

When you want to give a gift that speaks from the heart, give Popvase, a combination flower vase and greeting card.

Chanukah, birthday, anniversary or any occasion, flowers will say a lot more when they arrive in a personalized vase that will serve as a lasting memory of that special occasion. All you have to do is let your imagination run wild and write a message on the space provided before putting Popvase together.

Those who balk at anything that needs to be assembled will be thrilled at the ease with which the vase can be put together. Simply sign a card, slip it into a clear outer sleeve, insert a bag, fit on an oval ring, add water for cut flowers or sand for dried flowers and arrange the bouquet.

Popvase is available in three major collections, each one consisting of a series of six different motifs, so not only will you speak from your heart, you can say it with style.

The Flamingo collection, the least expensive of the three, features bright, colorful motifs and a series of pre-written messages for those who are a little pen-shy.

Heritage, a more sober, mid-range collection comes in a variety of colors and marbled patterns and Museum is a prestigious collection consisting of reproductions of famous paintings by the masters.

You can choose a vase to complement the flowers, a room, or simply because you like it. The choices are limitless.

Popvase is available at flower shops, card and gift stores, garden centres, department stores and just about anywhere you can buy flowers and greeting cards.

Long after the flowers are gone, they will remember who sent them.

Shopping woes are cured

Dr. Fleas International Markets offers quality items sold below retail prices, as well as year-round produce from 35 farmers.

With over 400 vendors, Dr. Fleas is one of the largest flea markets in southern Ontario and offers a wide assortment of goods.

An average of 10,000 to 12,000 people visit Dr. Fleas every weekend. Located at Highway 27 and Albion Road in Rexdale, the market can be easily identified by a gigantic 35-foot inflatable yellow and black flea.

And there really is a Dr. Flea — alias Allen Koffman. He wears a lab coat and stethoscope and wanders around the market with a microphone, announcing vendors' specials on Radio F-L-E-A, and he gives away prizes every 20 minutes.

"We try to put fun into what we do," Koffman told The CJN. He said his late father taught him "the lighter side of business and how to have fun," as well as "how to treat people."

Koffman, 38, said he decided to start his own flea market seven years ago — he's been involved with flea markets for 22 years — because he didn't like the way he was treated by some flea market owners. He's made a point of treating his vendors fairly, he said.

Koffman's rapport with the vendors is excellent. "It's a pleasure to be in the market when you have someone this nice [Koffman] to look after you, Dorothy Vincent, the owner of the Newfie booth told The CJN.

Her opinion is shared by many vendors. For example, Frank Devellano, of Audio Music — he specializes in buying guitars at stock clearances — told The CJN, Dr. Fleas is outstanding. "It's the best promoted and managed market," he said. With 25 years of flea market vending behind him, he should know.

Dr. Flea - Allen Koffman - presents a gift basket to Daniel Nosic II. [Barb Silverstein photo]

Customers are also pleased with the market. "[The farmers] have beautiful stuff," says Mike Kurtz of Bathurst Manor, who recently discovered Dr. Fleas. "And the prices are really reasonable."

Rip Partridge shops there three Sundays a month. "Everybody is friendly. They give you all the help in the world," he said. "Anything you want is here. You get variety."

There are some booths that may be of particular interest to shoppers looking for quality Chanukah gifts at bargain prices: Treasures for Tomorrow specializing in porcelain dolls; Ngai Gallery with oriental crafts and bonsai trees; the Hobby Shop selling collector cards and model car kits; and Monet's with discounted luggage and leather goods.

There are a number of stalls with well-priced clothing. Small to Oversize owner Arela Belkin offers some fabulous prices — ranging from $10 to $100 — on over-sized and regular apparel.

Shiron Fashions also sells clothes — at roughly 30 per cent below retail, while at Tequila Sunrise you can find body suits at 50 per cent off. Not to be missed for men is Good Looks, a stall specializing in pure silk ties — including some with Disney characters — which sell for 50 per cent below retail.

Anyone interested in quality children's clothes should visit the Kids' Closet opposite the Newfie Booth. The clothing — all 100 per cent cotton — is hand-sewn by owner Marta Kertesz and can be custom-ordered at no additional charge. Two-piece cotton-lined corduroy suits start at $25. Dresses are in the $50 range. Custom-made clothes are generally ready within a week.

Dr. Fleas is open weekends from 9 to 5. For more information call 416-745-FLEA (3532).

Replicated museum jewelry a solid gold gift purchase

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Michael Macesic worked as a design engineer, but eight years ago he was so taken with a line of period jewelry he followed a longtime dream and changed direction.

Macesic is the Canadian distributor of two different lines of period jewelry and this spring he launched Creation Elegante — a line of handcrafted Victorian and Art-Deco giftware.

In 1985, Macesic went to the Frankfurt giftware show — the largest trade show of its kind in the world. It was on a whim, he said.

At this show he found his first line of jewelry — sterling silver art nouveau reproductions. "I saw that line and fell in love with it," he said.

Macesic sells the line to jewelry and gift stores across Canada. Retail prices start at $12 for small rings and run as high as $450 for some bracelets. The starting prices for earrings, broach, necklaces, and bracelets respectively are $18, $40, $48 and $90. The line is sold by Vicky's Jewellery (393 Eglinton Ave. W.) and Marquis Jewellers in the Cumberland Terrace.

Eight months ago Macesic started selling a second line — authentic replicas of museum pieces. "The whole world is compressed in this line," he says. It spans many civilizations from ancient Egypt to the 20th century.

The pieces are crafted in brass, pewter or silver, and gold-plated in 22 karat gold. Semi-precious and precious stones are used in most items. The jewelry retails from $22 to $350 and all pieces come with explanations of their historical significance.

Macesic said the museums where the jewelry pieces originate get royalty fees from the sales. And in Canada sales have been very brisk.

Allison Duncan, an assistant buyer for Mr. Smith, a womenswear store at 1235 Bay St., is enthusiastic about the museum reproductions. "I sold out of it within a week," she said. She recently reordered for the fourth time.

Mr. Smith had stopped buying jewelry because there wasn't much change in style, but "now there's a big boom in jewelry," Duncan said.

"Big jewelry is out. Everybody's doing the replicas of museum pieces of the past, like Elizabethan and Victorian. The new style for the '90s is minimalistic and small. In the '80s, you showed your wealth."

Macesic's line of jewelry is well-priced, she added.

At Mr. Smith, replicas of Russian egg-shaped jewelry in gold-plated silver with amethyst and malachite stones and Egyptian Lapis tube earrings sell for $120 and $90.

Macesic is especially happy to be on the creative side of his products. "To make things you envision and that people really appreciate is a great joy," he said, referring to Creation Elegante.

She said her interest in decorated art deco perfume bottles — the most popular item of this line — came as a result of her travels, where she became familiar with European styles.

But she said the idea for the line came to her out of the blue. "One day I looked at my perfume bottles and I decided to make them more feminine," she said. The line developed from there. It's very much a creative process — all the items are hand-decorated in metallic pleated silks, Makuba lace from Japan, ribbon, silk flowers and/or synthetic jewels.

He said the company cannot keep up with the demand because it's not a product that can be mass-produced, and finding workers with a knack for this kind of creative work is difficult.

Sales have quadrupled since the line was introduced this spring, he said. "It started as a sideline of the jewelry business, but it's becoming more like a main line."

Perfume bottles retail from $34 to $38, and can be found at Crabtree and Evelyn Stores. Picture frames and jewelry boxes start at $44 and $58 respectively. All these items can be bought as sets and are available at the Chair Place in the Promenade and the Country Garden at 2607 Yonge St.

Rate your mate!

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Do you think you know everything about your mate — favorite food favorite television show, pet peeve, musical tastes?

Pick up a game of Rate your Mate and you'll quickly discover how much, or how little, you really know.

Distributed by Zibbers, Inc., Rate your Mate is a hilarious game with no bulky boards, buzzers or dice. Couples simply jot down answers from hundreds of questions presented on playing cards.

If their answers are the same, it's kiss and tell and they score. If their answers differ it's miss and yell; and no score.

Simple, we thought, as two couples recently sat down to play. We'd each been married for at least 10 years. What wouldn't we know about our spouses?

After some minor squabbling (It's my game; I'm the guest...), we chose a moderator who was instructed to ask each couple 10 questions, alternating between male and female.

Males write down the answer to the first question and, at the same time, the women write down what they think the man answered. The next question is addressed to females and the same procedure is followed.

We were given our first question. When your mate is in the car alone, he/she listens to a sports, music or talk show. I chuckled as I visualize the points flowing in. He knows I listen to music and since all-sports radio hit the air, he's been hooked.

The moderator posed the second question: What section of the newspaper does your mate read first? I laughed. I always read Ann Landers before the news. We began to feel sorry for our friends. After the next question — Would your mate prefer to gamble at a race track, casino or not at all? — we were flying. Everyone is aware of my husband's dreams of Las Vegas.

We were all anxious to check the scores, so after a brief discussion we decided to bend the rules a little and reveal our answers. A look of surprise replaced my condescending smile as I heard my mate's answers to the question about his radio habits. "What do you mean you listen to music? You've listened to nothing but sports for years," I cried.

"With no baseball or hockey what is the point of listening to sports?" he asked, astonished that I didn't know he'd switched allegiance. The other couple, ahead by three points tried to hide their glee.

Moving on to our newspaper ritual, I can't believe my husband thought I read the front section first. "Do you want everyone to think you put Ann Landers ahead of current events?" he chastized.

I'm reminded of the story about a couple on the Newlywed Game. When his wife asked how he could say that prime rib was his favorite food when he did not eat red meat, he replied that he didn't want people to think he couldn't afford it.

The gambling question came easily and we scored our first set of points. Our opponents were delighted because they had answered all questions correctly, but I informed them that this game didn't count because we bent the rules. On to the real game. This time we won't let them win.

(Available in game stores across Canada.)

Chanukah Gifts

A holiday lineup of children's gifts

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

The 39-year-old owner of Video Invasion on Bathurst Street started making toys four years ago strictly as a hobby and now his toys, many of which feature Disney characters, are sold around the world.

Walt Disney Studios rarely gives anyone permission to use their characters, but Wayne Fromm accomplished what some believe to be impossible when they gave him the go-ahead. "It's an unusual situation," he said. "Disney does not license inventors a lot."

Over the past four years he has created 20 toys, including the popular Beauty and the Beast magic talking mirror, which currently has sales of more than a million worldwide, as well as a line of hot-selling Mighty Morphin Power Rangers toys.

Fromm brings the Beauty and the Beast mirror, now a toy-industry classic, back for its third season this year. When a child pushes a button on this hand-held vanity-type mirror, characters from the animated feature appear and talk to the child. The voices belong to the original cast, among them Angela Lansbury, Jerry Orbach and Robbie Benson, who did the voice of the beast.

A mirror is available for Snow White, the 50-year-old animated Disney feature that was recently released on video. Snow White and the seven dwarfs sing as well as talk on this one.

The magic talking lamp from the film Aladdin operates much like the mirrors, but instead of pushing a button the child rubs the lamp to see the characters and hear the voices of the original cast.

Fromm's latest up-to-the-minute Disney toy this season is inspired by the movie The Lion King. This toy features the lion cub Simba, gazing into a pond on which the characters are reflected. Characters speak in the voices of the film's actors, among them Matthew Broderick and James Earl Jones.

The Mighty Morphin Power Rangers line of toys, based on the television series, is a success with boys and girls age 3 and up, and with adults. Some have become collectibles, said Fromm.

The Mighty Morphin Power Rangers talking arcade bank is a miniature video game. When a coin is inserted, the screen lights up and character images accompanied with sounds from the TV show appear.

The term morphin, from the word metamorphosis, refers to the transformation that occurs in the series when the children in the series change into their superhero costumes.

Fromm's Disney toys, available at all Disney stores, and his Mighty Morphin line, on sale at Toys "R" Us and other major toy stores, cost about $24. The high bouncing balls are $1.98.

One of Fromm's newest toys, to be on the market shortly, is derived from the Canadian television show, Dudley the Dragon. Another toy for the new animated Disney movie, Pocohontos, is being developed.

His Pink Panther Bubbles, already for sale in the United States, will be available in Canada this spring. Profits from the bubbles go to the Starlight Foundation, which helps critically ill and disabled children.

When Fromm is not travelling — he has manufacturing facilities in China and showrooms in New York and Hong Kong — he is busy inventing and designing toys at Video Invasion, which he opened 14 years ago.

Send a Can-A-Gram

Niomi Herblum tells people to 'can it' on a regular basis.

She isn't being nasty; rather, she's offering them a unique gift wrapping idea.

Herblum's Can-A-Gram business supplies decorative cans for all occasions - from Chanukah to anniversaries to Get Well Soon. There are over 50 different labels from which to choose.

Can-A-gram is operating from a kiosk at the Promenade Mall and the results are promising. Cans retail from $4.99 for the small unfilled cans to $39.99 for large cans filled to brim with gifts and kosher and sugarless candy.

In order to provide the ultimate in consumer convenience, Can-A-Gram also delivers.

All cans come wrapped in celophane and ribbons with their own can openers!

Herblum has been on the receiving end of one of her own cans. when her first child was born, her husband packed an I Love You can with chocolate kisses and a string of pearls.

"Fortunately, he remembered to put a can opener on top so I could open it in the hospital," Herblum says.

Her business philosophy is as much fun as her product. "If it fits in a can, I'll can it!"

Romantic holiday scents

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

If you want to give a romantic Chanukah gift to that special someone in your life, think of romancing the nose.

Romance enhancing products with scent appeal — fragrant candles, soaps and other bath products — have become the rage.

For a romantic evening, put on the soft music, dim the lights and fill the room with soft candlelight. But don't use ordinary candles. To really set the mood try aromatherapy candles. Made with botanical aphrodisiacs, these candles are designed to stimulate romance.

Lise Ellacott, the owner of Ottawa-based Renaissance Imports, sells such candles. She is the Canadian distributor of Sensual Pleasures Aromatherapy Candles, candles scented with essential oils.

The seven types of "romance candles" are made with sandalwood, patchouli, neroli and ylang ylang. There are candles for relaxation, congestion, romance, energy, slimming, PMS and headaches.

"Aromatherpay is very much the trend," Ellacott says. "The botanical oil blends of natural ingredients have known therapeutic values."

The relaxation candle is the most popular followed by the romance one, Ellacott says. The candles are environmentally friendly, all natural and made without cruelty to animals.

The marbled candles retail for $14 and burn 60 hours. A sample pack of votive candles in an attractive container retails for $19. These candles are sold at Nastri and Eaton's stationery department.

Seracon Products, a Montreal-based giftware company, also offers a line of aromatherapy candles hand-crafted in Montreal. Versailles Candles are all natural, environmentally friendly and made without cruelty to animals.

Carole Gilman, the owner of Seracon, says the company has developed several different scents: vanilla and peach, roses and honey, fresh flowers, cappuccino, gardenias, lavender, and wintergreen.

The candles burn for 50 hours and sell for $26. They can be found at Robin Kay and the Nature Shops.

Herbal Metaphors' Scented Stones are an unusual scenti-mental product which comes in three fragrances — eucalyptus, lavender and vetiver. The stones are distributed in Canada by Market Expressions Ltd. in Nova Scotia.

Joan Pearson, the owner of Market Expressions, says the stones are environmentally friendly and their packaging is appealing. "It's an award-winning design," she says. "You don't even have to wrap it."

The stones, which come in a wooden box, retail for $36 and can be found in the Ontario Gallery of Art gift shop and Gingers International Bath Centre.

Enchantment Gift Company, a Monbtreal-based mail order company, distributes Sunfeather, a line of natural, vegetable-oil based fragrant soaps and bath products from New York.

Debbie Starnes, the owner of Enchantments, became a distributor after trying the products. "I really loved it. When you like something so much you want people to try it."

Starnes sells two "love soaps" — Aphrodite's Bath and Erotica's Bath — that sound like they could be romance enhancers, but she says they're just "gimmicky soaps."

But she does carry Sunfeather's line of aromatherapy soaps and oils. "The scents go to your head and affect your mind," she says. These aromatherapy products come in four fragrances: Dream Time, Honor Moon, Synergy, and Passion Flower, "supposed to stimulate sexual energy."

Aromatherapy bath kits sell for $23.50. Natural soaps and gift baskets start at $2.60 and $11.95 respectively.

Renaissance Imports also sells a line of aromatic bath products, Essential Pleasures, similar to the aromatic candles. The bath oils and body lotions in 8 oz. bottles and retail for $7.

Market Expressions has a line of fragrant bath products and perfumed candles, and Seracon offers an extensive line of vegetable-based beauty soaps from the South of France priced from $3.50 to $10.

All these companies offer plenty of products for those looking for romantic gifts for their significant others. So rev up the old olfactory nerves and get your nostrils in gear. Plan on sniffing your way to a romantic evening this holiday season.

Potato Latkes are one of the most delicious of all Jewish festival foods

1	small onion, finely chopped or grated
3	large baking potatoes, peeled
1 tsp	salt
1/4 tsp	freshly ground pepper
3 tbsp	matzah meal or cornflake crumbs
	Oil for frying
1	3
3	5 mL
1 tsp	1 mL
1/4 tsp	50 mL

Combine eggs & grated onions. Grate potatoes into egg mixture, stir well to prevent discoloration. (If using food processor, chop onion with steel knife, blend in egg and add potatoes in chunks. Process until potatoes are finely chopped.) Add salt, pepper and matzah meal. Heat oil in large skillet to measure 3/4 in/2 cm deep. Add batter to oil by spoonfuls and flatten each pancake with back of spoon. Cook until crisp, then turn and cook 2nd side. Drain pancakes on paper towels. (When you cook each batch, add more oil if necessary, but add between batches.) Makes 16, 3" latkes.

Shape, Shine and Glamour

by Joy Cherry

I have just returned from the ego-driven tides of high fashion week in Europe. It reminds me of Biosphere 2, a self-contained mini-universe in the Arizona Desert. The jammed streets of Montenapolene in Milan embrace the American fashion buyers as they herd together like a convention of Amish undertakers, wearing that angst look of coal- black pantihose, short skirts, narrow trousers and high laced boots.

In contrast, the exquisite Four Seasons Hotel on via Gesu pulsates with energy as all the top models arrive in their jeans and knapsacks, greeted by huge bouquets of magnificent blossoms. America's top retailers converge in the lobby, exchanging air kisses with representatives from the great designer houses, while the international press and photographers wander through the foyer trying to see and be seen.

Then the fashion schedule begins. A domino effect of the fashion bribery tax scandals and late starts dogged the shows in Milan, which left tempers frayed.

Europe '95 fashion points to shape, megawatt shine and glamour. Jackets, cut for serious curve. Skirts, minis or handkerchief hem lines in chiffon. Colour brilliant. Pants, every collection has them, high waisted, cuffed, draped, skinny and wide, always worn with heels.

Valentino great; John Galliano interesting and very 'forties. Rena Lange classy and elegant. Miuccia Prada young, fresh and a welcome antidote to the glamour and disco flash that permeate Milan.

(Now, how do I assimilate the above, so I can maintain our philosophy of "Perceived Value and Fashion Awareness"? I shopped the Italian market and bought for you beautiful offerings for this season. Oversized cozy sweaters for weekend wear. Some with turtle necks that coordinate with separate vests, blanket stitched edges, and some with intricate stitched fronts. There are others more dressy with pearl detailing on the front. A tantalizing array around $125.00.

Shearling swing jackets with detachable hoods made of entrefino lamb, the lightest, most supple shearling. Temptingly priced at $1290.00, or $1790.00 for ankle length.

Speaking of winter . . . laugh in its frosty face while wrapped in a glorious, nutria-lined coat, fur-trimmed at the cuffs and collar. Long and lightweight, it shields the body from winter's icy talons. (I bought one for Mom). Brave the winds in a sleek Alpaca-and-wool coat trimmed with Mongolian Lamb. Choose a faux leopard jacket made from Tissival, the most superior of faux fur. Environmentally friendly and unbelievably priced at $500.00.

Knits are one of the few certifiable hits of the season; our entire Italian collection is now 20% off.

Here at Joy Cherry in our Couture Atrium, we present cocktail dresses, glamorous gowns and evening separates for every simcha. Special designs, colours and sizes are personally tailored to order. Our famous suits in four-ply silk, that come in an array of shades, are paired with long, straight or double-layered silk chiffon skirts. Or revel in the sheer delight of a filmy gown or a daring, strapless bustier dress topped with a handknit Angora jacket trimmed in black Maribou.

Tuxedo dressing captures the mystique of men's wear and couples it with alluring femininity. Select from our unparalleled assortment of Mila Schön and Louis Féraud evening pant suits, accented with beaded bustiers or white camisoles aglow with Swarovski crystal buttons. Perhaps a fabulous corset in navy satin with black beading and front lacing. Royal Winter Fair perfect.

Speaking of royalty . . . poor Di and Charles of the roiling libidos. Ah, the agony, the ecstasy. Do we really care? However, I do feel that Di has retained her royal dignity despite Charles' written confessions. 'Tis the winter of their discontent.

A hat is the cherry on your fashion sundae. Steve Kokin, my cousin and one of the leading millinery designers in the country, has added his expertise to our jaunty, saucy collection of hats. Set off an elegant silhouette with a cocktail whimsy, or a daytime chapeau for your winter coat or suit.

Accessorize with splendid faux jewellery, black velvet capes and boleros, wonderful cashmere lined gloves, fox trimmed hats to match. You want it, we have it!

Needing respite from fashion, I spent a day visiting the old city of Sabbioneta, just outside of Mantua. It is an exciting time warp to enter the 16th century synagogue on the second floor of an ancient building. This synagogue was designed by the famous architect Andrea Palladio and has the classic proportions of great style so typical of this architect. The city was renowned for its Jewish printers which are memorialized by the street via Della Stemperia. From there, lunch at I Tre Garabaldini, where the regional favourite, Tortelli di Zucca (pumpkin-filled pasta) is so delicious and definitely one of my cravings.

Well, I am now back to home and hearth, feeling shortchanged without those Italian double-cheeked kisses. My thoughts traverse the upcoming season and dance into Spring '95.

I think . . . of viscosa, a wondrous new woven spring fabric.

I think . . . pink.

I think . . . of the 1940s renewing themselves once again — stiff Duchess of Windsor hairdos, red lacquered fingertips, and shoulder pads.

I think . . . of cleavage and my cup runneth over.

Why do designers insist on the revealing and the provocative, as sexual harassment runs amok? I suppose fashion, like thought, is a matter of mind. If you don't mind, it doesn't matter.

Be well. Be happy. Be yourself.

FT creator: 'My lack of stylishness was an asset'

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Jay Levine, the creator of City TV's Fashion Television (FT), recently told an audience he got the idea for the show when he flipped through a Vogue magazine.

He said he was struck by the number of ads and thought a television show on fashion, which could offer a much more dynamic presentation than a magazine, would attract a lot of advertising revenue.

Levine was one of two speakers at an educational/social program for members of the United Jewish Appeal's (UJA) Young Business People's Network (YBN).

The other speaker, Greg Masel, is the director of Young Leadership (English-speaking countries) of Karen Kayesod, an organization which raises funds for Israel in partnership with the UJA. He spoke about Yachdav 195, the international young leadership mission to Israel in August.

Jeanne Beker

Rosie Sosnowicz, the UJA campaign associate who oversees the YBN, was pleased with the turnout of 140, which she said "was the maximum capacity."

"We usually like to get young local Jewish success stories to speak," she said. "FT is syndicated across the world and we're proud that the brains of this operation came from our community."

Levine's initial efforts to launch FT about 10 years ago did not meet with success. He said he was turned down when he first pitched the idea, because City TV chief Moses Znaimer didn't think the show would have enough mass appeal.

But when CNN launched Style, a show similar to FT, about a year and a half later, Levine got the go-ahead from City. "They decided to get on the bandwagon with me and my idea."

Levine's lack of interest in fashion — he was previously an assignment editor on City Pulse — enabled him to create a program with mass appeal, he said.

"My lack of stylishness was an asset. I was more interested in making [the show] entertaining."

He acknowledged an element of elitism on FT. "It's about clothes you can't have."

He also admitted that initially he was not sure about working with Jeanne Beker, the host of FT. "She was dying to do [the show]. I had a problem at first, but I've come round," he said, acknowledging that Beker's stature as a television personality draws attention to the show.

"You can love her or you can hate her. But everybody has something to say about Jeanne."

FT, which first aired in 1985, was an instant success, Levine said. The first year there were six half-hour episodes and the following year the demand was for 39. The weekly show is now seen by more than 10 million people in over 80 countries, and advertisers have to wait a year to get a spot, he said.

The success of the FT concept — the application of the magazine format to television — has spawned other shows at City — Movie Television and Media TV. City is also franchising the FT concept to sell to Europe, Levine said.

"They're buying the raw footage and putting it together in a more familiar format for their audience."

FT covers a wide spectrum of topics relating to design and art, Levine said. "You can do whatever you want. There's nothing stopping you from flying anywhere in the world" to interview anyone you want for the show," he said.

Except logistics. The show sometimes uses reporters based in Europe, because it isn't feasible to fly there every week, Levine said. The budget accommodates a wide range of travel — he would not disclose the amount — but this year travel costs decreased when American Airlines became the show's official airline.

Levine, the producer and director of the show, has a core staff of five, with an estimated cost of $70,000 an episode, which he said "is extraordinarily low by industry standards."

He told the audience he feels fortunate to have had the opportunity to create FT. "I was lucky because City stuck with [the show] and believed in it," he said. "It paid off for me and for them."

Line designed for Kids Only

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Vikki Norris recently hosted a Kids Only party at her home.

Kids Only is a line of mid-priced children's clothing that can only be bought at home parties.

The group in Norris' living room carefully examined an assortment of children's clothing — dresses, jump suits, pants, vests, shirts, turtle necks — displayed on a clothes rack. The clothing starts at $16 for a turtle neck, and goes as high as $47 for a woven fleece jumpsuit.

Norris chose a turquoise and purple striped combed cotton dress for her 7-year-old daughter, for $37. Norris told The CJN it was well worth the price for the quality.

Colleen Robicheau, one of the guests, was impressed with the selection. "I like that they have accessories to go with the clothes," she said.

Another factor appealed to Dianne Ritza. "There's lots of room for growth," she said. "The style is big and baggy."

Patti Durkee, the Kids Only sales consultant, offered advice to the shoppers. But there was no hard sell.

"It's not really necessary," she said. "The clothing ... sells itself." Durkee likes selling a product that meets high standards, she said. "Cindy buys the best quality."

She is referring to Cindy Eeson — the owner and founder of the Calgary-based Kids Only Clothing Club Inc. Eeson said in a recent telephone interview that she began the company because she couldn't find stylish, affordable, quality clothing for her children.

"I just wanted a home-based business," Eeson said, explaining that she needed some stimulation outside of parenting, as she had given up her law practice to raise her children.

A child-related business appealed to her because so much of her time and energy was focused on her children.

"I thought, why not find a business that's related to children?" And there was a need for Canadian-made mid-priced children's clothing, Eeson said. "The market was wide open."

She found American children's clothing too decorative; European lines were too adult-like. So she set out to create a distinctly Canadian design. What she came up with is a stylish, but common sense approach to children's clothing.

The innovative designs — all clothes are 100 per cent cotton — are also practical. Not only does the baggy style fit any shape, but the clothing is designed to fit for two years.

There are five inches of fabric on pant cuffs — except for pants with elastic at the ankles — so the garment can be rolled down as the child grows taller. Waist bands are all elasticized and adjustable.

She also found a way to prevent knees in pants from wearing out, by designing a reinforced knee: a patch made of the same material as the pants, bonded to the knee area with fusible interfacing. The patch designed to be invisible — it goes on the inside of the pants — "is like iron," Eeson said.

The company's approach to color is also practical. There are four standard colors — raspberry, red, turquoise and royal blue — that are used in every collection (along with other colors) so that the clothes can be mixed and matched from one season to the next. Most of the clothes are unisex and can be worn by siblings of different sexes.

The clothing line was very marketable, but Eeson opted not to sell retail because it was too costly. She preferred to use the model of network marketing for her company.

Eeson thought the company would attract women like herself — stay-at-home moms wanting to work from home. "I think I was right," she said. "We have 800 people carrying our line of clothes and 150 on a list waiting for samples."

The company — now in its seventh year — had over $16 million in sales last year. Eeson gave up her dream of having a home-based business six years ago to run Kids Only full time.

Kids Only consultants work part-time. They are all self-employed, earning 25 per cent of their sales, and additional money if they become unit leaders. Some earn as much as $60,000 for eight months of work, Eeson said.

Toronto-area consultant Durkee (416) 635-5115, sells for Kids Only two nights a week. As a full-time elementary school teacher, her time is limited. "I make a little extra money and I get to clothe my child beautifully," she said.

People living outside the Toronto area can call the head office in Calgary, (403) 252-9667, to find a consultant in their area.

Sophisticated children's apparel

By RACHEL ALKALLAY
Special to The CJN

A sense of style develops early in life. Well-dressed children blossom into adults with elan. To set the child on the road to fashion sense, Francoise Bouthillier has been creating clothes for kids for the past decade and a half.

Bouthillier bases her creations on the styles of days gone by, heavily favoring the Victorian and early Edwardian eras. Children are outfitted as small adults, using fabrics which are suitable for their elders to create a European-style sophistication for children.

Fabric is key to the line: gorgeous raw silk purple dresses, dotted with gold; a multi-striped bolero jacket in silk, pockets trimmed in gold; frocks in muted taffeta prints, finished with lace jabot collars to continue the Victorian theme.

Bouthillier's boutiques, which are outlets exclusively for her creations, sell only one item per size at a locale. Therefore, all items are original, a concept which the designer continues to promote.

Bouthillier's fashions were recently selected to be shown to a Japanese princess and the fashions sell strongly across Europe and North America, with clients coming from Ontario and New York to view the collections.

Hunter green

Bouthillier began designing and manufacturing 15 years ago in Quebec. She currently produces three lines, all produced in the province: Haute Couture, her signature collection for which she is renowned; Bouthillier Sport; and the Charles Edouard line, for boys ages 6 months to 6 years.

The Bouthillier Sports line developed from customer demand for more casual clothing incorporating the fine detail for which the designer is known. The line includes lavender cotton pants and sweat tops, imprinted with a Victorian lady's shoe, circa 1890.

Wearable plaid skirts, swirling red skirts and short jackets, mixed and matched for the well-dressed little girl; black velvet lace borders, tartan patch pockets with ruffled edges sewn over coats; darling capes with matching berets complete the outfits.

The Bouthillier Sport line is comfortable and classic, easily wearable and chic.

The Haute Couture line is created with the same attention to cut and style as that given to adults' clothing; like the Bouthillier Sport line, it is available in sized 6 months to 14/16 years.

Capes are woollen, with detailed side pockets. Hats are trimmed in black velvet. The effect is charming

A full line of accessories complete Bouthillier's clothing. Every dress is matched with a fabric hairband or bow; patterned outfits boast a selection of hair ornaments. Barrettes carry an autumn theme of red apples on green leaves; for the bolder girl, little mice are featured as well.

Colors are sophisticated. Few styles are found in traditional children's shades; hunter green, coral, khaki, oversize prints of Victorian roses, elegant reds are featured. This season's line has pompons sprinkled on collars and dress edges, adding a frivolous touch to outfits.

The Francoise Bouthillier line includes shoes for both boys and girls. Several styles in walking shoes are unisex; the elegant little girl sports classic black lac footwear.

Because the boutiques are outlets for Bouthillier's fashions, clothing is automatically priced at one-third off the retail price at the beginning of the season. During the season, occasional items are featured at half-price for about a week. The price range is for every pocket: from $50 to $400 for Haute Couture outfits.

Also carried in the boutiques are gift items by Bouthillier: hatboxes, old-fashioned picture frames, antique-style dolls, cards and teddy bears.

Belgium sweaters warm up Canadian market

By RACHEL ALKALLAY
Special to The CJN

Supple sweaters in soft shades are the hallmark of Mer du Nord, a style-oriented European company which is introducing its line in Canada.

The company, begun in Belgium in 1988 — its official label reads Mer du Nord 01.Mai.1988 — has consistently expanded its client base. Over 300,000 pieces are now sold each season in France, Italy, Spain, Denmark and Germany, and the company has begun selling to Japan.

Charles Le Pierres is Mer du Nord's representative in Montreal. He says quality of fabric and attention to detail are what make their sweaters stand out from other sweaters and tops.

In the spring/summer 1995 collection, Mer du Nord's first season in the North American market, 58 of the 300 styles available are shown. Mer du Nord also creates hats, socks, shoes and purses, but decided to show only its sweaters and tops for its North American debut.

The Parisian-born Le Pierres believes that both manufacturers and customers should have more respect for the garment and appreciate quality and construction over price. One well-made garment stands up to longer wear than three cheaply-made ones. Customers should demand quality of workmanship from every article of clothing, regardless of price.

"A woman still deserves to get good detail, and she deserves to look good no matter how much she spends," believes Le Pierres.

"Clothes for work should be as well-made as clothes for special occasions."

The imported sweater line from Mer du Nord does not skimp on either fabric or detail of construction. Pique formed into patterns where single lines blossom into a multiplicity of lines and other delicate piqued designs are featured.

Diamond patches of pattern

The Mer du Nord collection is created in Belgium, with 80 per cent of all items manufactured there. The remaining 20 per cent is made in Hong Kong. "When dealing with silk, Hong Kong is essential," says Le Pierres.

In Belgium, the company creates its own cotton fabrics, using old-fashioned machines which were previously used to make delicate lingerie. Hence, the cotton knit is finer, more delicate, and the feel of the textile against the skin is smooth. And the finely-woven cottons look as good after a year of wash and wear as they do when bought.

To create some of the more complex knits, up to five different textures are used: modal, silk, and rayon mixes weaving soft knits which flow against the body.

Sleeves are longer, draping over the wrists for ease of wear. V-neck and round necks continue the soft appeal.

Colors are classic: wheat, ecru, ivory, soft beiges, peach, pale blue, navy. Soft sea-greens mixed with moss are the only hints of stronger shades. Solid hues or blends of colors in the same family are a staple. In contrast, a sweater in the new collection sports diamond patches of patterns intermingled with patches of solid and pale burgundy.

Affordability is coupled with quality for the collection. Mer du Nord's cotton sweaters retail for $45 to $85; silk and silk mix sweaters range from $105 to $240.

Mer du Nord fashions are available at select shops in Montreal, including Dolce Donna, Collection 24 and Delavanti.

Winter in the City

Remember when buying skin cream was a relatively easy task?

You would simply go to the cosmetic counter and choose a cream that was best suited to your skin type and budget.

In the past couple of years things have changed dramatically and it's due to alpha-hydroxy acid (AHA). There are so many products on the market each claiming to be better than the other it seems that in order to choose the right cream, we need nothing less than an advanced degree in chemistry!

AHAs are derived from such natural sources as sugar cane, sour milk and fruit and may very well be the beauty elixer of the '90s. AHAs are a cure-all for everything from fine lines and dry skin to that youthful glow many thought was lost forever.

To try and simplify all of this, AHAs fundamentally accelerate the skin's normal exfoliation process and therefore promote the regeneration of new cells. It seems quite logical to me that, with this constant renewal of cells, our skin will appear more youthful.

It has been said that the '90s are the decade of antioxidants. Free radicals are highly reactive atoms with one or more unpaired electrons which can cause oxidation in the cells, a process that in turn leads to premature skin aging. Therefore, a formula that contains an antioxidant such as vitamin E will neutralize free radicals and counteract this ruinous process. Again, it seems logical to me that halting this destructive action will keep our skin looking fresh.

The winter months are, of course, the most harmful to your skin. With the severe winds blowing and thermostates on high, your skin is dehydrating rapidly. It is definitely time to get into your winter skin care regime. I'm not only talking about your face - be sure to take care of your whole body including your hair. Below is a list of new products that will help you combat the harsh effects of the winter months.

SKIN

NEOSRATA Skin Soothing Cream contains glycolic acid (derived from sugar cane), which has the smallest molecule in the AHA family and therefore has the highest level of penetration. It will make your skin feel rejuvenated and alive. It is a daily exfoliant and moisturizer which will smooth out wrinkles and reduce fine lines. Visible results will be seen in about 10 days.

Use NEOSTRATA cleanser and eye cream for best results. If your hands and feet have dry, rough skin, you'll want to try NEOSTRATA hand and body lotion, It's great around your cuticles. Buy some for your favorite guy - he'll love it.

ALLOETTE'S new Aloespa products include a terrific Hydrating Masque that promises to provide a cool boost to tired skin, restore lost moisture and leave your skin looking refreshed and radiant. Aloespa Prime Complexion contains a unique alpha-hydroxy formula combined with aloe; the two together will make your skin softer and revitalized.

MARCELLE Multi-Defense Cream and Lotion is a non-greasy, antioxidant formula that also includes an SPF factor of 15. It protects the skin against the negative effects of UVA and UVB rays. It is allergy tested, perfume free, PABA free and non-comedogenic. Remember it is essential to protect your skin on a year-round basis

HAIR

NEUTROGENA moisturizing shampoo for permed and color treated hair is a must for those cold winter days. Its conditioning agents will create softness, bounce, fullnes and vibrancy. You can follow with NEUTROGENA oil-free conditioner (wax-free formula) for styling manageability.

To stop bad hair days try NEUTROGENA HeatSafe, an instant heat-activated hair treatment. HeatSafe doesn't just coat the hair; as heat is applied, the special combination of wheat proteins and amino acids is absorbed to strengthen the hair fiber and retain moistures. After one application of HeatSafe, independent laboratory studies demonstrated that hair was up to 30 per cent stronger and more elastic, thus allowing hair to withstand the cold, blistering winds of winter.

BODY/HAND

ALLOETTE AloeSpa bath and shower gel is most popular because of its outstanding fragrance. If you are tired and stressed, try this product to get you going.

NEUTROGENA Rainbath spray on dry oil is a unique moisturizer that is absorbed instantly by your skin. This feather-light oil - with a brisk citrus and floral scent - is enriched with apricot kernel oil that leaves the skin feeling silky smooth.

CHEEKS

Apply blush high on the cheekbone and blend with a Velcro sponge. To achieve that sought after edgeless look blend in a circular motion. New cream to powder formulas are great and long lasting. Most popular shades will be in the rose family.

EYES

As you add your extra sweaters, add a little extra eye makeup to your eyes. Create a little drama with smoky khol pencils and perhaps a little white, frost eye shadow. Don't let your heavier clothing overpower your face. Give your eyes some sparkle.

LIPS

MARCELLE introduces Rouge Impeccable, an exciting line of long-wearing lip color in 36 beautiful shades and three textures: cream, matte and frost. Rouge Impeccable is specially formulated with vitamins A and E, as well as a sunscreen. It is hypo-allergenic, perfume free and clinically tested. The colors are gorgeous. Check it out.

Mirabelli makes his way into the Mexican market

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

On his 10th year as a designer, manufacturer and retailer, Franco Mirabelli has become the first Canadian to be carried by the high-end Mexican department store, Palacio do Hierro.

Mirabelli celebrates this as a sign that free trade is working for Canadians and that financial times have turned for the positive.

"We produce a quality product and it's exciting that a market as wealthy and international as Mexico City appreciates what I do," he says.

Born of Italian parents, Mirabelli reflects his European heritage in his designs. The Mirabelli label has developed a reputation for luxurious and distinctive sportswear separates, made from fabrics from the same European mills that supply Giorgio Armani, Max Mara and Escada.

While the fabrics are imported, everything is manufactured in Canada to maintain the line's approachable price.

Mirabelli says streamlined, minimal, beautifully made clothes "is what I believe is modern, so that is what I did for Fall 1994. It is not about gimmicks or fads or what's in or out. It's about what I think the customer wants and what my vision of modern dressing is all about. I believe my clothes have substance and style. They are not for everyone but the woman who understands what I do, loves them."

Mirabelli says despite recent seasons of soft deconstructed styling, suits and tailoring are regaining importance. "It requires a softer but more controlled hand."

Jackets, the essential element of this collection, are understated and beautifully cut. There is a military-influenced jacket with Nehru collar, fitted seven-button shawl collar jacket, softly shaped shirt-tail jacket and the retro long flute-sleeved jacket.

A bell skirt, long or short fringed sarong skirt, skinny cigarette pants and wide-leg cuffed pant round out the collection.

Each fabric group has about five different textures. The mocha group includes solid crepe, mocha/grey gingham check, small shadow check and wool/polyester crepe. A classic charcoal collection features jacquard floral, charcoal/gold tapestry jacquard and tone-on-tone stripe co-ordinates with textural chevron, floral and tapestry.

For holiday wear, a textured viscose/acetate blend in black-on-espresso, black-on-black patterned jacquard and black and ivory solid silk georgette give that dressy look.

In addition to five stores in Mexico City, Mirabelli's wholesale accounts span across Canada and to many stores in the United States including Saks Fifth Avenue, Nordstrom, Jacobson's, Rare Essentials, Carriage Shops and Jones on Madison. A retail store, Portfolio, is located in the Toronto Eaton Centre. Television personalities such as Jeanne Beker, Mary Garofalo, Dini Petty, Marilyn Dennis and Ann Rohmer wear his designs on-air.

THE TIE: an essential accessory

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

In a sea of blue, black and charcoal grey suits, it is the man's tie that stands out and demands to be noticed.

"A man makes a statement when he wears a tie. He says, 'Look at me, I am an individual,' " says Norman Katz, national sales manager of Ultimo 82 and Domar, a line of silk ties, designed and manufactured in Italy.

Katz says "the bottom line is that men still wear ties. Even with the trend towards dress-down Fridays, ties are still important. Some companies only dress down in the summer and others still like the men to wear ties, even as an accessory to a more casual look."

On those less formal days, silk knit ties add a touch of business to the casual attire. "These ties are not lined," says Katz, "so they hang lighter and they are not as constructed as a more formal tie. They look great with a flannel or denim shirt and a blazer. A less formal tie is a good way of balancing the business and casual look. A navy and gold diamond silk knit tie can add life as well as a touch of formality to a denim shirt."

When casual is strictly taboo, it is the woven silk tie that adds fashion flare to professional attire. "These ties are the same weight as silk knit but they are more formal. They blend perfectly with top fashion clothing and add sophistication and an international feeling to a business suit. In a sea of colors ranging from earth tones such as browns and camel to navies and burgundies, they are classic ties that can be worn anywhere."

Katz stresses that a tie is an essential accessory that can make the suit. "When a man changes his shirt and tie, he looks like he is wearing a different suit. In a formal office, a tie may be the only thing that allows a man to remain an individual. I like a tie to be seen. Mix and match a bit.

Wear a patterned tie with a striped shirt and do not be afraid to overpower the shirt. Ties are supposed to stand out. They are the icing on the cake."

He advises that men buy at least two or three ties for each suit and "keep them interesting. Do not buy an olive tie to go with an olive suit. Choose a contrasting color such as gold in a floral, diamond or striped pattern. A diamond patterned tie in gold and cream looks terrific with a beige suit and blue or green shirt. The Ultimo 82 and Domar lines have a little bit of everything for every personality. Each tie shows a suit in a different way."

As for comic ties? "Those are a fad – in one year and out the next.

If a man is buying a tie, it should be a classic design that he can wear year after year. Ultimo 82 and Domar ties are well-priced, well colored, classic, yet modern."

Ultimo 82 and Domar ties are available in menswear stores across Ontario.

And now...

Kosher lipstick? After the giggles end, the question begs to be answered: what could be unkosher about lipstick?

Insects.

Many lipsticks contain the ingredient carmine, a brilliant dye derived from the pulverized shells of the female cochineal beetle. Cosmetics is a glamor business, after all.

If that isn't appetizing enough, we are reminded that "all creeping things that creep on earth shall be an abomination: It shall not be eaten." (Leviticus 11:41.) Insects are simply not kosher.

Kosher dietary laws maintain that "you are what you eat." How tempting is the thought of squashed insect paste on your lips, anyways?

Biting your lips, licking the lips and leaving lipstick marks on food would constitute eating treif.

That's where Cinema Beaute, a company that produces a strictly kosher lipstick line, comes in. "Nothing unclean shall touch your lips" is its motto.

Created in New York City, the biggest Jewish city in the world, the lipsticks are certified by the Orthodox Union. They are kosher for Passover and pareve too. Use them when eating meat or dairy products. Use them when eating matzot. Suitable for all Jewish occasions.

By Jewish law, it is forbidden to put on make-up during Sabbath. This poses a problem, particularly for Orthodox women who have Saturday functions to attend. Cinema Beaute kosher lipsticks are long lasting, and don't require frequent touch-ups. Sleep with the lipstick on and have one less thing to worry about for the morrow. It's also a great way of never looking pale and washed-out in the morning.

Honey Mocha, Galilee Garnet

Cosmetician Annie Young immediately saw the potential of the lipsticks when she was introduced to them by Rhonda Goldberg, president of Areisal Cosmetics Inc. in Toronto. The lipsticks have appealed to many women other than the Orthodox. "One woman bought all nine colors in stock," recalls Young, the sole Montreal distributor of the lipsticks through Studio Annie Young.

The creamy lipsticks come sealed in elegant black and gold cases, marked with a stamp of kashruth and pareve. The colors are a spectacular range of shades harkening to Israel: Red Sea Red, Mount Carmel Coral, Rose of Sharon, Jaffa Orange, Promised Land Pink, Shayne Ponim, Sinai Sienna, Milk and Honey Mocha, Galilee Garnet.

Very kissable kosher lip!?!

Supplier Goldberg is known as Toronto's "Shabbos Make-Up Queen." A former model and make-up artist turned Orthodox, Goldberg practices her craft for weddings. She recognizes the challenges faced by Orthodox women who want to be attractive on the Sabbath while obeying Halachah. The long-lasting color of Cinema Beaute lipsticks means no reapplication on the Sabbath.

Goldberg believes she is the only one in Canada to import kosher cosmetics for the growing industry. Her line of products includes kosher eyeshadows and blushes. Certification for kosher make-up products is difficult to obtain, because the rabbis pose very strict regulations on the ingredients and the process which goes into the creation of halachically-correct cosmetics.

"The products aren't only for the kosher crowd," says the lively Goldberg. "People who are against cruelty to animals, who want to use animal-free products, are interested in this make-up."

Lipstick ingredients include castor oil, candelilla wax, beeswax and mineral oil. (By way of contrast, non-kosher lipsticks include petroleum oil derivatives and the infamous beetle mash.)

"There is no mitzvah in being ugly," believes Goldberg, whose make-up expertise brings out the best in women.

Kosher lipsticks are available exclusively in Montreal at Studio Annie Young, Decor Decarie, main floor, telephone 739-8880.

In Toronto, Cinema Beaute Lipsticks are available at the Kosher Food Warehouse and at Shomer Drugs. Or call Rhonda Goldberg at (905) 886-7754.

Arafat vows to crack down on Islamic fundamentalists

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip — The Palestinian government in the Gaza Strip intends to disarm Islamic fundamentalists, PLO chairman Yasser Arafat pledged last week.

Speaking to an Americans for Peace Now delegation visiting his seaside headquarters in this dilapidated town, Arafat said the crackdown will be gradual so as to avoid triggering a Palestinian civil war.

Arafat, whom Israeli authorities have criticized for not doing enough to combat Hamas and Islamic Jihad terrorism, claimed the Palestine National Authority (PNA) has taken control of Gaza.

Arafat made his remarks prior to rioting last Friday in the Gaza Strip, in which 15 Palestinians were shot dead by Palestinian police.

"The Israelis have to understand that we've succeeded in controlling the Gaza Strip," he said during the one-hour meeting.

The Palestinian police force, he said, has seized 26,000 "pieces of arms" since moving into Gaza last summer.

Israeli reaction to shootings

See page 35

Arafat charged that the Shin Bet, Israel's internal security agency, has flooded Gaza with weapons in a bid to weaken the Palestinians.

He claimed that an Israeli vehicle, containing "50,000 bullets," had been seized in Gaza recently, after it crossed Israel's Erez checkpoint. "Not 20 or 50 bullets. It is 50,000! Can you imagine it?"

The ammunition, he said, was bound for Hamas. He did not identify the smugglers.

Arafat said he was incensed that the contraband had been smuggled past Israeli soldiers. He claimed that Hamas leadership is based in Jordan, which recently signed a peace treaty with Israel, and said some Hamas leaders are members of Jordan's parliament.

"Why blame me?" he asked rhetorically. "Why not blame Amman?"

Calling for more "coordination" between Israeli and Palestinian security forces, Arafat said Hamas and Islamic Jihad – "these fanatic groups" – receive funds from Saudi Arabia, the Gulf states, Iran and the United States.

Arafat suggested that, in the 1970s and 1980s, Israel had strengthened Hamas by encouraging Islamic organizations opposed to the secular nationalism of the PLO.

He said "enemies of peace" like Hamas were winning new converts because less than 10 per cent – or $68 million (US) – of funds promised by international donor nations to the PNA had been released so far.

"Promises, promises," he said bitterly. "Instead of $700 million, $68 million. Peanuts!

"Give me one good reason why they are not transferring the money. Every time they are putting new conditions."

JCC talks heat up

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The never-ending saga of the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) has taken yet another series of sharp turns.

In past weeks, representatives of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, Richter & Partners, the JCC's court-appointed receiver, and philanthropist Wilfred Posluns have been negotiating the possible reopening of the Leah Posluns Theatre (LPT).

They have also discussed ways of satisfying the financial claims of the JCC's unsecured creditors, including the 31 JCC and LPT employees who were let go about three months ago.

However, the seven-person board of directors of the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) has gone on record opposing any arrangement that will see the BJC lose control of the theatre. The parties to the negotiations were in court on Monday to place their positions before a judge.

The News In Brief

CANADA

Nazis Get Votes

TORONTO — Three avowed white supremacists who ran in recent municipal elections in and around Toronto all lost, but still polled thousands of votes.

Wolfgang Droege, leader of the neo-Nazi Heritage Front, won 802 votes in the race for Ward 1 councillor in Scarborough. He was defeated by the only other candidate.

Front member Max French received 2,792 votes in his bid to become mayor of Scarborough. He placed fifth in a field of six.

And perennial candidate Don Andrews, a one-time leader of the defunct Western Guard Party, polled 2,721 votes in the race for mayor of Toronto. He finished fifth in a field of 11 hopefuls.

Neo-Nazi Links?

VANCOUVER — The near-fatal shooting this month of Vancouver abortion doctor Gary Romalis, who is Jewish, may have been the work of a neo-Nazi group, the Vancouver Sun reported last week.

Romalis, a former chair of Combined Jewish Appeal, barely survived a sniper's shot through the window of his house. He is under police guard in hospital. There have been no arrests to date.

According to the Sun story, while the fact that Romalis performed abortions may have been a motive in the shooting, police are not ruling out "other possibilities."

Tribute to Feld Carr

HALIFAX — National officers of Canadian Jewish Congress, meeting here last week, adopted a resolution thanking Judy Feld Carr, head of the National Task Force for Syrian Jews and members of her committee.

The task force worked for more than 20 years "towards the day when every Jew in Syria would have the right to leave the country if they so desired," the resolution read. Almost every member of Syria's Jewish community has left the country.

"As was the case with the plight of Jews in Ethiopia and the former Soviet Union, we are witness to a joyous and successful conclusion to what has been a very long struggle."

ISRAEL

Settlements Won't Move

JERUSALEM — No Jewish settlement will be removed during the interim period of the agreement with the PLO, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said last week after visiting military installations in Gaza and talking with residents of Netzarim.

"In the Declaration of Principles, we were firm [in saying] that during the interim period of the agreement no settlement will be uprooted," Rabin said. "We demanded this, the Palestinians agreed to it, it is included in the agreement, and it is my intent to carry it out."

Rabin's statement came amid increasing calls to move Netzarim, a settlement of 31 Jewish families in the heart of Gaza.

More Jews in Territories

JERUSALEM — The number of Jews in the territories grew by 10 per cent to 116,000 in 1993, despite a shift away from government support for settlements, the Central Bureau of Statistics has reported.

But the rate of growth was around 10 per cent, down from the 12-15 per cent growth rate in recent years.

The figure includes both births and migration, but excludes eastern Jerusalem.

The report showed 13,800 Jews moved to the territories in 1993, down from 14,000 in 1992. A total of 6,800 settlers left Judea, Samaria, and Gaza, up from 6,400 in 1992.

Concern for Scientists

JERUSALEM — Senior academic staff at Israel's institutes of higher learning last Tuesday braved heavy rains to join a demonstration of immigrant scientists from the former Soviet Union who may lose their jobs.

Some 800 top-notch scientists are likely to find themselves unemployed when Absorption Ministry grants come to an end. The first 150 are already unemployed, spokesmen for the Zionist Forum and the Public Council for Soviet Jewry said.

They urged the government to accept a plan drawn up by Tel Aviv University chemistry professor Eliezer Gileadi for the absorption of 500 outstanding scientists at universities and research institutes.

Surrogate Motherhood

JERUSALEM — Israel's High Court of Justice last week gave the government 45 days to explain why surrogate motherhood should not be legal in Israel.

It was responding to a petition by 25 couples who cannot have children on their own, and are interested in employing a surrogate.

The petitioners argued that the 1987 health ministry regulation forbidding surrogacy is illegal, because only the Knesset can enact such a rule.

The government countered that the health and justice ministries were working on new regulations and asked the court to postpone hearing the petition until they had finished.

However, the justices rejected that, saying each petitioner has a "biological clock" ticking and if the case drags on too long, some of them could become infertile.

Austrian's Statement

JERUSALEM — Austrian President Thomas Klestil concluded a three-day visit to Israel last week, and acknowledged his nation's role in the the Holocaust.

Addressing a special session of the Knesset last Tuesday, Klestil said a full acknowledgement of his country's complicity in the Holocaust was long overdue and that Austria should do more to compensate Jewish survivors.

"All too often we have only spoken of Austria as the first state to have lost its freedom and independence to National Socialism, and far too seldom of the fact that many of the worst henchmen in the Nazi dictatorship were Austrians," Klestil said.

"No word of apology can ever expunge the agony of the Holocaust."

While not making any specific pledges, Klestil told the Knesset that Austria should consider following the lead of Germany and make reparations to the victims of the Holocaust.

WORLD

Funds for Auschwitz

OSWIECIM — German government officials signed an agreement here earlier this month to provide at least 6.8 million deutschmarks to finance the building of a heating system in buildings now being used as museums at the site of the Auschwitz death camp.

Bonn will provide as much as 10 million DM up to 1996 for a wide range of preservation projects at the camp.

A foreign ministry statement says the preservation of the site "cannot be guaranteed by the Polish government alone."

German contributions to preservation measures at Auschwitz total some 29 million DM.

Ikea Founder Apologizes

STOCKHOLM — The founder of Ikea, the Swedish-based international furniture retailer, has apologized for his involvement in pro-Nazi groups in the 1940s.

Ingvar Kamprad's association with the far-right was first reported in the Stockholm daily Expressen.

Kamprad, 68, has sent a handwritten letter to the 25,000 Ikea employees worldwide to apologize.

"This is a part of my life that I bitterly regret," he wrote. He said he attended meetings led by Swedish right-wing activist Per Engdahl between 1945 and 1948 because he "admired and shared (Engdahl's) fanatical anti-communist view."

Antwerp Jews Worried

ANTWERP — The Jewish community here has taken special security measures after Jewish owners of a clothing shop found stickers with anti-Semitic slogans on the store's windows.

The stickers bore swastikas and slogans such as "We are back" and "Don't buy from Jews."

The 20,000-member community reacted with outrage, and attributed the incident to the recent political success of the right-wing Flemish Bloc, which scored important gains last month in Antwerp's municipal elections. One out of three people voted for the party.

A special unit of the city's police force has been ordered to investigate extremist activities.

Manitoba's Beach Shul at Winnipeg Beach. [Matt Bellan photo]

Manitoba shul vandalized

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the second time in three years, teens have used the cover of Hallowe'en night to desecrate a Manitoba synagogue.

In 1992, an 18-year-old was charged with mischief for spray-painting the north Winnipeg Lubavitch Centre. This year, the target was the small synagogue at Winnipeg Beach.

The 50-year-old Beach Shul is used in the summer months when large numbers of Winnipeg Jews flock to their Lake Winnipeg cottages 45 minutes northwest of the city. The shul has a membership of about 35.

Two 16-year-olds have been arrested and charged with mischief after the synagogue was founded spraypainted with "Die Jews," "KKK" and "666" (the sign of the Devil in apocalyptic numerology).

According to RCMP Const. Kelly Glaspey, the teens have no previous criminal record nor any known links with hate groups.

"We put it down to youthful stupidness," Glaspey said. The two also knocked over numerous outhouses and garbage cans.

Synagogue member Laurie Mainster, reflecting the views of many other members of the Winnipeg Jewish community, has his doubts. "It strikes me that their actions were too deliberate," he said.

The permanent Beach community was also disturbed by the desecration.

Police keep watch on hate groups

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto police intelligence officer has said everyone needs to be aware of hate groups and their effects.

"It's vital that we develop and maintain awareness of the hate groups in our society," said Det. Sgt. Wayne Cotgreave of the Metropolitan Toronto Police Force.

Cotgreave was keynote luncheon speaker at a recent one-day conference on The Extreme Right: International Peace and Security at Risk held at the Park Plaza Hotel.

The conference, sponsored by the Institute for International Affairs of B'nai Brith Canada, brought together about 60 professionals and community activists concerned about right-wing extremism.

The conference was one of four being presented in Canadian cities. Another was held in Montreal in early November, and Ottawa and Winnipeg will have conferences on Nov. 29 and Dec. 2 respectively.

Cotgreave said police estimate there are four organized hate groups in the Metro Toronto area, with an estimated 150 to 200 people involved in the movement and about 1,500 associates. The groups prefer to be called "white nationalists" or "racialists" to hate groups, he said.

The apparent 51 per cent increase in hate crimes this year can be attributed to increased awareness and reporting, Cotgreave believes.

"Police generally are aware now of this problem," Cotgreave said. Metro police analyze hate crime data, educate the public and help victims.

Although groups such as Aryan Nation, Heritage Front, Church of the Creator and Liberty Net may change their names frequently, their goal of wanting a pure white race and their membership remains constant, Cotgreave said.

One of the "more disconcerting areas" is racist rock music. "A young person will listen to the [racist rock] message four to five times a day. With a pamphlet, they may read it once and throw it out."

The main thrust of hate group activity now is recruitment, specifically of young people, said Cotgreave. "Youth are seen as being more impressionable, more vulnerable and having the desire to belong to something."

Other hate group activities in Metro include rallies and exchange of information with counterparts across Canada and in the United States and Europe.

Metro Toronto police meet informally every other month with other municipal police forces, including Ottawa's, to exchange information on hate crimes and hate groups.

"Police are committed to dealing with the problem," Cotgreave said.

CJC sends strong message to Legion

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — The Canadian Jewish Congress will continue to send a message to Royal Canadian Legion branches that refuse to bend on the head-dress issue.

Members of the national community relations committee (NCRC), meeting in Halifax Nov. 13-14, said they would urge groups considering using legion halls for upcoming company and private holiday parties to alter their plans if the hall has discriminatory practices.

"We are asking people wanting to engage a legion hall to ask the hall's head-dress policy and, if necessary, move to another legion hall for their function," said Bernie Farber, director of the NCRC.

"We're imploring churches, unions, muncipalities and other groups to stand with the Canadian Jewish Congress and Sikh organizations and be heard on this matter. And we want to remind politicians on all levels they should not visit legion halls that discriminate."

Bernie Farber

Committee chair Hal Joffe of Calgary said Congress has had a positive response, receiving letters from legion branches "telling us they changed their head-dress policy. We do not have exact numbers but now think the minority of legion halls restrict admission" to Jews and Sikhs wearing yarmulkes and turbans, respectively.

"We give credit to those who realize the significance of the issue," he said.

He emphasized Jews did not boycott the purchase of poppies prior to Remembrance Day. In Calgary, where he said all legions are discriminatory, the community Jewish council bought poppies directly from the Poppy Fund and distributed them to merchants.

"We still ensured funds went to needy veterans and their families, but did not funnel those funds through the legions," he said.

The NCRC meeting, attended by more than 20 national committee members, also faced the ongoing issue of racist extremism in Canada.

"We are now seeing a youth movement in the extremist racist element," said Joffe. "It's a small group with numbers that aren't increasing significantly, but they are more active in promoting an agenda of violence than were their predecessors."

Joffe said education is the key. "We have to make our community and the general public aware. These racists would like to take over society. I don't think they can do that but they can certainly hurt people."

Halifax teacher suspended for depiction of Holocaust

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — A Nova Scotia primary grade teacher has been suspended for four days without pay, for graphically depicting the Holocaust to her class.

As part of a Remembrance Day program, Cherene Naugler split her Riverport District Elementary School class of 5-year-olds into group of Jews and Nazis, to demonstrate the Nazis' responsibility for the destruction of Jews in World War II.

She chose those with dark hair and eyes as Jews who were to die in the gas chambers and later have their bodies burned. The fair-haired children were to portray Germans.

More than a dozen parents complained to the Lunenberg County (100 km south of Halifax) school board.

"I didn't think there was any need for anybody to be that graphic describing the Holocaust to a bunch of 5-year-olds," parent Heather Stoddard told the board. "I have no problem with her teaching that something happened, but I do have a problem with [the way she did it]. She should have better judgment."

The superintendent of the Lunenberg County District school board said this type of lesson has been used to instruct teachers on ways to sensitize children to the issues of prejudice and racism, "but it was inappropriate for children of this age," said Terry Sullivan.

Provincial education minister John MacEachern said he was disturbed about the exercise because it put children in the position of victimizing other children. "I was uncomfortable when I read about it [in Nov. 18 editions of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald]. I don't believe that's acceptable."

Lawrence Freeman, president of the Atlantic Jewish Council, said he will write a letter of complaint to the minister. "I think a four-day suspension is ridiculous. I find that method of teaching offensive, a process much different from the normal method of teaching. And this brings into question other teaching methods she might have used."

He said Naugler must be required to take some sensitivity training before she is allowed to return to the classroom.

School board administrators called in two psychologists to talk to the students about the incident. A school board official said he was told by the psychologists the students were "generally unaffected" by their roles. But at least one child experienced nightmares, "possibly because of a recent death in his family," according to an Education Department report.

Naugler, who has been teaching young children for more than 20 years, had been supervised earlier for a period of time because of other complaints.

Israeli gets first-hand look at neo-Nazis

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Having boldly infiltrated the top echelons of Germany's neo-Nazi movement, former Israeli paratrooper Yaron Svoray felt more than mildly uncomfortable on the 1992 day he sat with 30 neo-Nazis in the woods and an elderly ex-SS guard put a gun to his ear screaming, "Juden! Juden!"

Quickly, Svoray leaned forward out of range of the gun, then reached behind and grabbed and broke his accuser's hand.

Svoray had previously told his Nazi hosts he was the emissary of a wealthy American sympathizer who wanted to invest heavily in the neo-Nazi movement. "That's it, I've had it!" he shouted, jumping up. "You guys are nuts, you accuse me of being a Mossad agent, I'm leaving!"

Several others chased after him and apologized, Svoray said in describing the incident during a talk at the Jewish Book Fair. Svoray is the author (with Nick Taylor) of the recent book, In Hitler's Shadow (Doubleday, $34.95), which recounts his journey inside Germany's neo-Nazi movement.

Svoray, who has worked as an investigative reporter and a detective, met a young neo-Nazi on his first trip to Germany, and found they both knew something about German film. "He thought that anyone who knows about German films between the two World Wars had to be a Nazi like him."

His new friend brought Svoray — who used the alias Ron Furey — to a private movie theatre where Nazis watched footage of Hitler, followed by a film of five men raping and murdering an 8-year-old girl. "All the men in the room stood up and shouted 'Sieg Hiel!' and I must have lost consciousness," Svoray said.

Yaron Svoray

"When I came to, I punched my friend in the face, then drove from Frankfurt to Paris — I left my luggage at the hotel — and got on an El Al flight back to Israel. For the next five days, I couldn't touch my wife or hug my kids."

With tactical assistance from the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles, Svoray returned to Germany, intent on penetrating to the very heart of the neo-Nazi movement — which he found peopled with multitudes of doctors, lawyers, accountants, bankers and other ordinary Germans.

"The skinheads are more numerous and violent than German police have admitted," he said. "In the nine months I was there, I was involved in four heavy-duty fights, and I managed to put four neo-Nazis in hospital. There is no greater fun than a Jew beating up Nazis in Germany."

According to Svoray, some Germans accept responsibility for the Holocaust and want to make reparations, while others express a profound indifference to what happened 50 years ago and care only for beer, soccer and their annual holiday in Majorca. A third type, Svoray said, vigorously defends the Third Reich, deny there were ever more than 400,000 Jews in Europe, and assert that the world would have been a better place if Hitler had prevailed.

After going public with his secretly recorded information, Svoray was convinced he would put some of Germany's neo-Nazis in prison. "It's been a year since I came out of the closet, and I'm sorry to say that not one of these neo-Nazi guys has gone to jail."

All German politicians have done is enact tougher laws against Nazism, he said, but they do not have the will to enforce them.

Asked about Ernst Zundel, the Toronto purveyor of Nazi propaganda, Svoray said, "He's considered by the neo-Nazis in Germany as the second best friend they have. Zundel always comes into the conversation — he's a major player. What I can't understand is how the Canadians let this guy get away with it."

An HBO made-for-television movie based on his experiences is currently being produced, Svoray said.

Memorial service held for Waxman, Poraz

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — More than 250 people crowded into an area yeshivah recently to memorialize Nachshon Waxman and Nir Poraz.

Poraz was the Israeli commando who led the failed Oct. 14 raid to free Waxman, kidnapped by Hamas. The kidnappers killed Waxman minutes into the commando raid.

The solemn Ma'ariv service at Yeshivat Bnei Akiva Or Chaim was sponsored by Bnei Akiva of Toronto and Mizrachi of Toronto.

In a scholarly memorial shiur on the obligation to give up one's life for a cause, Rabbi Hershel Schachter, rosh kollel of Rebbenu Itzchak Elchanan Theological Seminary of Yeshiva University (RIETS), said the sages had different opinions.

He methodically explained that ahavas Hashem (love of G-d) forms the way we think and outlines our obligations, while kiddush Hashem (sanctification of G-d) is the act which fulfils the mitzvah. He emphasized the importance of demonstrating commitment through actions.

The acts are examples to be emulated, he told the predominantly young audience.

Rabbi Schachter said ahavas Hashem is possessed by every Jew from before birth. Relating this to Waxman and Poraz, he said one was a Talmudic scholar and the other demonstrated this love under pressure.

"The actions of Nachshon Waxman and Nir Poraz, despite their differing backgrounds, this is kiddush Hashem."

Rabbi Schachter told The CJN he believes serving in the Israeli army is "a positive act" and those who serve sanctify G-d's name. "My own son-in-law served in the IDF and I am very proud of that fact."

Rabbi Menachem Gopin, national executive vice-president of Mizrachi Canada, chaired the remembrance siyum. He said Rabbi Schachter is an example of kiddush Hashem. "He travelled to Israel when Israel was being bombed so he could help and bring strength to the people of Israel. Rabbi Schachter is brilliance in action," he said.

Leo Baeck opens new campus

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

VAUGHAN, Ont. — More than 500 students, parents and staff of Leo Baeck Day School, the only Reform Jewish day school in Canada, recently packed the school auditorium for the official dedication of its new campus.

The 52,000-sq.ft. facility, which opened in September, also houses the Centre for Reform Judaism and is the temporary home of Temple Kol Ami.

Austin Beutel, immediate past president of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ), said the building demonstrates the growth of Reform Judaism.

"It cements the bond between synagogue and school and helps maintain a consistency between Judaic practice and schooling," Beutel said.

Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, chair of Leo Baeck Day School's board, told the crowd that when the school was founded 20 years ago, Reform Judaism was an organization in name only.

"Leo Baeck Day School has changed all that. There is now a common centre and the school reminds us that our children are our common cause. This building houses a dream."

He thanked the boards and members of Toronto Reform congregations for financial and moral backing of the project, and the parents for "shouldering an enormous responsibility. You can always have faith in the education the children will take away from this school."

Toronto businessman and philanthropist Leslie Dan, for whose family the building is named thanks to a generous contribution, reminded the audience that "what matters is that we are all Jews. Each component of Judaism has an important contribution to make and all of those components ensure the survival of the Jewish people.

"Jewish education is mandatory if we wish to survive. Those students will one day depart the school yet they will have ingrained values which they will carry with them for the rest of their lives."

Also taking part in the dedication ceremony were CCRJ executive director Rabbi Daniel Komito Gottlieb, Vaughan Mayor Lorna Jackson, Rabbi Eric Yoffie of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, and Joseph Steiner, chair of Toronto's Board of Jewish Education.

Holy Blossom Temple senior scholar Rabbi Gunther Plaut, who studied under Rabbi Leo Baeck, praised him for being a great scholar and a great human being and for making it possible for him to go to the United States from England to study.

In gratitude, Rabbi Plaut presented school director Zita Gardner with a letter written to him from Rabbi Baeck. "He was a human being, not just a name," said Rabbi Plaut.

Youth problems high on AJC agenda

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Continuity of Jewish activity among young people and parental guidance are keys to survival for small communities in the Atlantic provinces, delegates to the ninth biennial convention of Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC) were told.

Of all topics addressed, youth problems were the most extensively discussed.

"We have to seek the needs of students, recognize they have problems and understand them, and then use what we have at our disposal to solve them," said Jeremy Cohen, newly appointed assistant director of the Council of Jewish Federations.

"We see the campus generation as our next generation; so we must pull our resources together to reach them," he said.

Parents of children in very small communities appealed to the AJC and its arevim to provide programs that will keep children involved.

"Many of the children are linked through Camp Kadimah but they, and those who don't attend camp, need something through the rest of the year," said Ruth Noel of St. John's, Nfld., where there are a handful of Jewish children. "We must plan themed weekends that will focus on the young people's interests, making it worthwhile for us to send them to a major centre for activities," she added.

Gali Salamon, areva for the region since September 1993, has found that only a handful of children come to programs, though numbers are increasing slowly.

"We need support from parents," she said. "Every child has something to contribute but parents have to convince the kids they must participate."

Another session featured the reactions of four Atlantic university presidents who visited Israel on a Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) tour last July with 14 of their counterparts from across Canada. "I was tremendously impressed with the history, tradition, and human resources and outstanding development of the last 40 years," said Dalhousie University president Howard Clark.

CJC president Irving Abella, who hosted the tour, said in an interview the appearance of Clark, Ian Newbould of Mount Allison University (Sackville, N.B.), Daniel O'Brien of St. Thomas University (Fredericton) and Elizabeth Parr-Johnson of Mount St. Vincent University (Halifax) was "the first time in the history of any country that four university presidents spoke together in front of the Jewish community about their impression of Israel.

"We put the trip together to create a relationship in research and exchanges... between universities in Canada and Israel," said Abella. "We also want to show the presidents how far Israeli universities had come. They certainly saw the legitimacy of Canadian students taking courses there."

Clark said that visits of Israeli university presidents to Canada are also being proposed now.

Halifax rabbi says change necessary to ensure future

HALIFAX — Rabbis, youth leaders, students and national Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) officers addressed representatives of communities in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland recently at the ninth biennial convention of the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC).

"We can't live off the past," declared Rabbi Shlomo Grafstein of the Orthodox Beth Israel Congregation in Halifax. "There are new forces tugging all of us. But we have to stand up on the positives of our heritage for togetherness, not just the negatives of events like the Holocaust."

Marty Zelenitz, president of the Conservative Shaar Shalom Congregation of Halifax, said today's Judaism bears little resemblance to that of biblical times.

"It is a religion of constant change and adaptation. If we change ourselves and recognize overall change, we can build for the future," he said.

Sandy Brown, CJC education and culture committee chair, said, "Continuity is dependent on the individual, family and community seizing control of the Jewish identity."

For the first time in its 75-year history, Congress held a national officers meeting in Halifax, and at the same time, the CJC national community relations committee also met here.

During the convention, seven Atlantic Canadians were presented community services awards. The AJC recognized Frank Budovitch, Fredericton; Dr. Harry and Shirley Dubinsky, Sydney; Dr. Jayson Greenblatt, Halifax; Dorothy Mark, Moncton; Lou Michelson, Saint John; and Arthur Saffron, Springhill.

Chanukah

Chanukah is a holiday of moral purpose and physical courage. As such it is customary, and especially so this year, to remember the courage and moral purpose of the remarkable young woman Hannah Senesh.

Senesh was a young poet, a volunteer for the Haganah, who parachuted into Nazi-occupied Europe in March 1944 to rescue human lives. She was captured in June, imprisoned and tortured.

Fifty years ago this month, Senesh was executed by firing squad in a Budapest prison courtyard. Her life spanned only 23 short years.

Hannah Senesh and the Maccabees show us that in each generation the sparks of single individuals, determined despite all odds and unwavering despite all obstacles, can lift the heart and kindle the Jewish soul.

In a world made cynical by the dizzying pace of modern life, the conceits of modern technology and the disappointments of modern leadership, Chanukah is a soothing, restorative balm.

For eight days, for a few brief moments after each sundown, we inhabit a different place. We light the candles, we recite the blessings, we sing a song or two, and we likely eat a favorite food. Most important, we slow down and set aside time with our families to participate in a millenia-old, happy ritual of blessing and light.

The candle which we light is essentially a primitive and ancient instrument, yet it is elegant and reliable. Flame is shared from candle to candle until a perfect symmetry of light and candelabrial shape glow outward onto the street, illuminating the pathways of collective memory and declaring to the passerby that in this household reside the inheritors and guardians of Jewish history.

The story we tell with the candles is the familiar one of the Maccabees, the Hashmonean family that rallied the people of Israel and prevailed against a larger and better-equipped Assyrian Greek army. It is a testament to the irrepressibility of the human spirit, to inspired leadership and to a faith that cries out to the oppressor: "We shall not die, but live."

Five months before Senesh's death she wrote this poem. It is a fitting Chanukah recitation:

"Blessed is the match which is consumed
and lights a kindling flame.
Blessed is the flame that burns in the secret fastness of the heart.
Blessed is the heart with strength to stop its beating for honor's sake.
Blessed is the match which is consumed
and lights a kindling flame."

Worthy request

Since the first International Conference on Hidden Children took place in New York City in 1990, the Jewish world has focused on the plight of hundreds if not thousands of children born to Jewish parents, whose lives were saved by Christian families. The several conferences since then have highlighted, among other things, the terrible emotional burden which many of these children, now adults, have been carrying with them as a result of confusion about their identities. A Canadian, Dr. André Stein, has written a moving account of the dilemma faced by many of these formerly hidden children who must reconcile past and present loyalties.

Now a new concern has surfaced and it has been addressed by such people as Abraham H. Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith. Foxman has taken the high road in calling for an investigation of all those hidden Jewish children who were baptized by their foster parents but who to this day are unaware of their Jewish roots.

Speaking from Tel Aviv on the program As It Happens (Oct. 3), Foxman indicated that he has asked the Vatican to open baptismal records from World War II, in order to identify the estimated 10,000 Jewish children (his figure) who were Christianized in a life-saving gesture during the Holocaust.

Foxman pointed out that the release of such information will provide a heretofore unacknowledged portrait of the heroism of Catholic families, particularly in Poland, who risked their lives to save Jewish children. Thus far the Vatican has made no formal response to Foxman's request.

However, there is a new climate in Jewish-Catholic relations, and with the new entente between Israel and the Holy See the time may be propitious for the kind of information that Foxman is requesting.

FIRINGS AT JCC

I am writing after having read the sad letter from Jacque Foisier, a former employee of the JCC, which was published in The CJN, Nov. 3.

One major fact is not in dispute in this unfortunate matter. Mr. Foisier and 30 other employees of the former JCC were summarily dismissed without notice, without severance pay.

As a Jew, as a social worker and a one-time employee of a Jewish agency in this community, I am chagrined and to say the least embarrassed. If the persons responsible for the dismissals were attempting to prevent a financial disaster, they certainly succeeded in perpetrating a moral disaster.

I mourn the passing of the Jewish community of yesteryear, the community of our parents, bubbies and zaydes, a community of garment workers, junk peddlers, small merchants, social visionaries and crusaders for social justice.

I am sure that this community would not have tolerated such treatment of its servants. Surely the affluent Jewish community of today can and should find a way to do justice — yoisher — to Mr. Foisier and his 30 colleagues.

LIFE AFTER DEATH

If someone wants to know whether something is a necessary part of Jewish theology, what better way than to receive a unanimous view from three learned rabbis representing the three branches of Judaism? In this case, Rabbis Plaut, Saltzman, and Bulka are of the opinion that "the question of life after death is not a major concern in Jewish theology. . . " ("Rabbis Explore God's Role and Place in the World," CJN, Nov. 3). Rabbi Bulka's assent to this position is rather surprising, to say the least, given the unquestionable place that this belief has held in traditional Judaism.

There are a number of grounds for this belief in traditional Judaism. Justice is one of these grounds: in the absence of an afterlife it is clear, in light of all the world's suffering, that there is no Divine Justice. Or is Divine Justice not central to Judaism and to the entire fabric of the Bible?

In discussing the Holocaust, and general human suffering, the three rabbis use language institutionalized most recently by Rabbi H. Kushner in his best-seller on the subject. They speak of God crying with us, being with the children in the Holocaust.

If there is no Divine activity (besides crying and feeling sympathy), nor justice in the world (which an afterlife somehow makes possible), we can find very persuasive and simple explanations for evil in the world, by accepting a modernist, scientific view of man and the world. In such a case, we can abandon thought of an afterlife, together with the latest in Jewish theology, an impotent, troubled God who spends His time chronically dispairing over the troubles of a world which He created.

HAMAS TARGETS JEWS

Reading the 10 principles of Hamas (CJN Nov. 3) is indeed spine-chilling. However, it must be pointed out that there is only a difference in emphasis from the "standard" Covenant which is still binding on the PLO. Like the Hamas manifesto, the PLO Covenant also calls for the removal of the Zionist entity, creation of a Palestinian State in all of Palestine (from the Mediterranean to the Jordan), but it is somewhat more moderate in that it does not call for the ejection of all Jews but allows those Jews living in Israel before 1917 to remain.

Senior Israeli military experts, including the Chief of Staff, General Ehud Barak have publicly stated that there are only strategic differences between Hamas and the PLO and that Hamas is a more militant wing.

One of the main objectives of the Oslo Accord was that the PLO police would take the place of Israeli soldiers in combating the militants. Fourteen months later, it is obvious that this basic function is not being performed. Despite the murder of 96 Israelis, there has not been a single trial of any suspect, nor any extradition of known murderers for trial in Israel. Furthermore, we are told by our leaders that Hamas is attempting to kill the peace process. If this is the case, why have no PLO supporters been targeted by Hamas — only Jews!

THREAT TO PEACE

Suicide terror should not be allowed to win

By YESHUYAHU ANUG

During the last years of World War II, 3,000 Japanese kamikazes died in suicide missions against the allied fleet but their impact on its outcome was nil. Nor will the 'shaheeds,' their Islamic stepbrothers, do any better for their cause.

Before blowing himself up, a shaheed takes a ritual bath, says a special prayer in his mosque, tells a video camera about his mission and asks his family not to mourn his death but to rejoice his trip to paradise. Then he gets his final blessing from his religious mentor, puts a Koran in his breast pocket, close to his heart and a red ribbon around his head — and goes to his death.

By Yeshayahu Anug

The tiny settlement of Netzarim in the Gaza Strip first appeared in this column in February as an example of a self-made danger-spot. It was founded in the early 70s under the Labor government of Golda Meir by members of the National Religious Party and is now inhabited by 28 families of the Gush Emunim movement.

As the Oslo agreement with the PLO provides for the preservation of every Jewish settlement in the territories during the three-year period of Palestinian autonomy, a special contingent of the Israeli Army was committed to secure it.

Now a booby-trapped shaheed cycled to his own death and killed three of the watching soldiers. It hurts to think that these soldiers were the casualties of that clause, which was praised at the time as a significant achievement.

The last suicide attacks in the territories and in Greenline Israel were much too painful to be stoically accepted by the public as what they were — desperate attempts to end the peace process. Emotions in Israel ran high and were used by the opposition to demand very much the same thing. Government rhetoric was predictable and defensive. Terrorism carried out by mad fanatics at the cost of their own lives cannot be totally eliminated. Nor can it be allowed to alter the national agenda.

Now what? Now the evacuation of the Netzarim would be seen as a surrender to terrorism. Conclusion? Probably more troops will be employed for its defence. But in the West Bank too, where the next phase of the accord with the PLO is to be implemented, there are many isolated settlements in a similar predicament. How are they to be secured from shadeeds or from terrorist attacks? Probably — if no different approach is adopted — by the deployment of more troops and by the very costly building of more roads to bypass Arab towns and villages.

Meanwhile Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin denies any intention to abandon isolated settlements and move them to three clusters of massive Jewish presence in the territories. Other ministers indicate that this must eventually be done, whatever the political cost.

Rabin's government is now going through a difficult crisis. It has decided to move towards regional pacification and has scored some impressive points. It has made peace with Jordan, broken the unity of the Arab front and greatly improved Israel's standing in the world. An enviable record, one would say, perhaps better than that of any government before. So why is it losing public support?

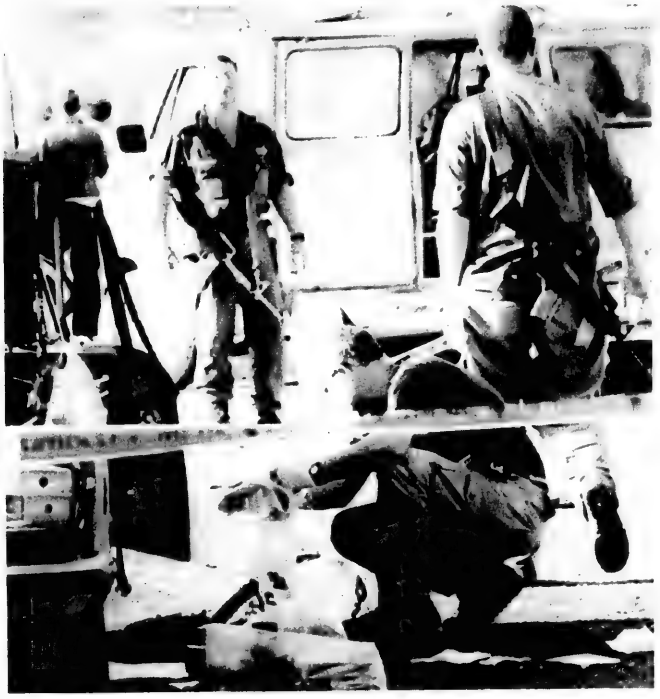
Unless it strongly believes and can convince the public that terrorism, however painful, must not be allowed to derail the peace efforts and that peace by costly compromise is the only alternative to perpetual chaos, Rabin's government could easily lose the war against terror as well as the struggle for peace and power. It should revise a number of concepts and update attitudes.

The government must not only fight the structure of local Islamic terrorism by force (and keep in mind that some celebrated raids have had very painful consequences), but also address the human environment where frustration breeds despair.

Since the Oslo agreement was made with the PLO, its survival as the only plausible partner is essential. Militant Islam is as opposed to Chairman Yasser Arafat's rule as it is to King Hussein's, as it is to Israel's very presence in the region. But while Islamic terror constitutes no existential danger to Israel, it could, if not crushed, remove the PLO and other pragmatic Arab regimes from the scene.

The political survival of the PLO leadership, already weakened by the growing popularity of its enemies, will depend on its ability to prove to the frustrated Arab masses that their policies will improve the conditions in which extreme fanaticism prospers.

Arafat may hesitate to confront his internal enemies too decisively for fear of civil war and seek compromises. He may fail altogether even if he tries hard. But Israel must help him maintain the upper hand in the territories, do so convincingly and stop hating itself for doing so.



Sign language continues to adapt to Jewish terms

By RABBI BERNARD S. RASKAS

Sign language is a method of communication for many deaf people. There are probably five or six thousand deaf Jews in the United States. However, few in the Jewish community understand the problems of deafness, particularly of deaf Jews.

Fortunately, conditions are improving. There are at least three deaf synagogues in America, Jewish societies for the deaf in various cities, Jewish deaf publications, and even a magazine for deaf children.

Leaving aside the controversy of how to best teach the deaf to communicate, it is of interest and value to learn how sign language must continually adapt to Jews and Jewish terms.

The ancient rabbis operated under the assumption that deaf people did not have any language, and therefore could not communicate. That is why they were barred from being witnesses.

However, as early as 1864 there was a school in Vienna that trained deaf children to speak and read Jewish texts. This being so, Rabbi Isaac Herzog, the first chief rabbi in Israel, ruled that deaf people had the same rights as all other Jews.

The London beth din (Jewish court) ruled in 1963 that deaf children should be able to "chant" the Torah in sign language. In 1968, Jonathan Shunary developed a system of Hebrew finger spelling. There is now a Helen Keller House in Tel Aviv, the Israel national centre for the deaf.

Lynn Gottlieb in New York has done pioneer work in creating new forms for Jewish expression in American Sign Language. For example, the classic sign for "Jew" was pulling a beard. This was not merely a sign of male chauvinism, it was also anti-Semitic, because the sign for a greedy person is also made by a pulling motion under the chin.

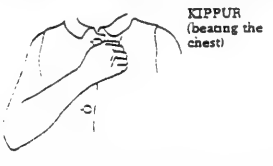
Gottlieb designed a new sign that is more appropriate. She combines the sign for people and Torah scroll. This also required a new sign for Torah, because generally American Sign Language used the Christian sign for Bible, which is "Jesus book," and shows the hands of Jesus on the cross.

Generally, a new sensitivity has now arisen in American Sign Language. According to Professor Elissa Newport, a psychologist at the University of Rochester, ugly metaphors, prejudices and stereotypes are being replaced in all signed languages.

Martin Sternberg, of the New York University Deafness Research Centre, relates the history of the old sign for Passover. In Scotland, people eat hard crackers, which they apparently break with their elbows.



Some deaf Scottish orphans brought their sign for cracker, i.e., hitting the elbow, to America at the turn of the century. The American Jewish deaf community used it to represent matzah, and then Passover.

This sign did not exactly convey the meaning of Passover. So, at a sign language workshop at a National Association for the Jewish Deaf convention in 1974, Celia Warshawsky, Alice Stoll, and Lynn Gottlieb brainstormed together and came up with a sign that shows the "passing over" into new freedom.

The sign for praying was hands folded together, clearly of Christian origin. Jews now use swaying, the same as in Israel. In addition, many Jews add the sign for "book," implying swaying with a book.

This has deeper implications. In using sign language, deaf people communicate with their whole body. Prayers have their own rhythms and breathing. It is often necessary that the words of the mouth be joined with the way our bodies feel. Sign language helps deaf Jews come closer to the meaning of prayer. This is a lesson for all Jews to learn.

It is interesting to note that in America Yom Kippur is signed by beating the chest. In Israel, the sign is covering the mouth — no food on Yom Kippur. These different signs signify a vast cultural difference on the essential meaning of Yom Kippur.

We usually think of the Shema as a prayer that tells all Israel to hear God is One. The word shema means listen, hear me, understand me. It is a prayer of communication, which has a particular meaning to deaf Jews. It says, "Look at us! Understand us! We are part of the Jewish community, too!"

Bernard S. Raskas is Rabbi Emeritus of the Temple of Aaron, St. Paul, Minnesota and distinguished visiting professor of Religious Studies at Macalester College.

Visiting the Washington Holocaust Museum

Ever since I missed its opening day because of another engagement, I wanted to go to Washington and see the place of which everyone has spoken, the new museum dedicated to remembering the Holocaust. So, when the Toronto UJA organized a special journey I signed up at once and found myself one of 168 on a chartered plane bound for a special experience.

Elie Wiesel had been in town the night before and I had asked him about his impressions of the museum. What could he tell me? What should I look for especially? But he refused to answer. "See for yourself," he said, "and then we'll talk about it."

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

The company was great; there were many friends and acquaintances. The day was bright — no overcoat was needed — a far cry from the dark and dank recesses of brutality we were about to experience.

One must remember that this museum is not a private enterprise by a public institution. A good deal of its capital funds and the majority of its running expenses are supplied by the United States government — which means that, as in all institutions, admission is free, and its personnel part of the civil service. Its official title is United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, and tellingly it is located on Raoul Wallenberg Place, alongside the Mall, Washington's prime space.

Since that visit I have tried to analyze my own feelings and found that they're hard to express. Perhaps I should start by saying that the Museum is like an abstract painting; you can read many things into it and much depends on what you yourself bring to it. At least, that was the way it struck me.

Much has been written about the museum's organization, its plan and its artifacts. It produces an all-enveloping experience: You begin with the fourth floor which shows the rise of Nazism, depicting its brutalities and evil intent. Then you descend a floor and enter hell itself: the camps, with their unspeakable environment; the killings; the persecutions; the degradation. At last you emerge to the floor below where there is hope and rescue.

The spirit of this unique environment gets hold of you the moment you enter its gates. A huge foundation stone on the outside provides the motto, the words of Dwight D. Eisenhower, testifying that if he had not seen it with his own eyes he would not have believed it. I noticed many of our people who ordinarily do not wear kippot took them out of their pockets and put them on. The evocation of the six million dead bore a mark of holiness.

Each one was left to his or her own impressions. One's previous Jewish experience, one's parents (who perhaps were themselves survivors), one's sense of Jewishness and sense of identity — all these played a role. In this environment, no one can really speak for anyone else.

As for me, it was as if yesterday closed in on me once again: the sight of Dora-Nordhausen, which our troops had conquered and discovered, all of which remains a vivid memory that pursues to me to this day. The war experience, the fighting, the killing — and then Dora with its thousands of dead and half-dead, the striped uniforms, the hollow eyes, the tears, the joy.

No museum can reproduce the reality, but this museum comes close.

People say that its very existence will reduce the impact of historical revisionism that denies the Holocaust altogether. Perhaps, but I do not like to think of the museum as something that has any ultimate purpose beyond being what it is: an attempt to honor the dead by remembering their lives, their suffering, no less than the dreadful philosophy that brought it all about.

When we emerged, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto intoned memorial prayers and we all said Kaddish. Afterwards, we went to the Israel Embassy. In more than one way, it was a trip from death to life.

If you go to Washington, be sure to visit the museum, and if UJA in your city makes arrangements for another tour, be sure to be part of it.

The Holocaust Museum was dedicated earlier this year. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Let's face it, Jews know how to take a joke

This may be a humor column — and that's a matter of opinion, according to the occasional nasty letter I get — but I like to believe that it takes risks.

(Indeed, the entire concept of "comedy" is risky; one man's meat is another man's "poisson," as the French like to say. Who of us has not laughed uproariously at a joke, until we suddenly looked over at our beloved spouse and was told "That wasn't funny"?)

By risks, I mean: I've often poked fun at fairly touchy topics, such as the UJA, rabbis' sermons and interminable chazzans. Even more dangerous, I've written several columns which actually parodied such precious Jewish rituals or holy books as Pesach, Shavuot, Sukkot, Kohelet (Ecclesiastes), even Pirke Avot — indeed, the most favorable letters I've ever received from you readers has been on the latter.

I'm beginning on this serious note — don't worry, I'll get silly soon enough — because I believe the favorable response to most of my most "risky" columns suggests something about our people and our religion: not just that we have a collective "good sense of humor" — and let's face it, if we Jews didn't have good senses of humor, we probably would have gone totally bonkers, centuries ago — but also that we Jews, while we feel that many things are "holy," are open to playful mockery of our beloved institutions and holy books, because we are strikingly tolerant of that kind of behavior. (Orthodox Jewish readers of this column will immediately know what I'm getting at here; think of "Purim Torah," in which Jews will actually do "mock" Jewish blessings, in the wild and drunken joy of that very happy holiday.)

So what am I getting at? Well, let me mention two names of good and gifted writers of another faith: Salman Rushdie and Naguib Mahfouz. Unless you've just returned from another planet, you undoubtedly know what happened to the very talented Rushdie; he wrote a book, Satanic Verses, in which he (apparently) negatively depicted the wives of the great Prophet Mohammed. The result: an open declaration by (some) Islamic leaders that he should be killed for his "blasphemy." He has been in hiding for over half a decade, and translators of his work have been murdered, all in the name of that religion.

By Allan Gould

You may not be as familiar with the great Mahfouz. The only Arab writer to win the Nobel Prize, this kindly, decent Egyptian has been hated by Islamic fundamentalists for many years, since some of his books poke gentle fun at his faith. And just a few weeks ago, the 83-year-old genius — and he is a wonderful, poetic, unforgettable writer — was stabbed in the neck and nearly murdered by — guess who?

You may not be as familiar with the great Mahfouz. The only Arab writer to win the Nobel Prize, this kindly, decent Egyptian has been hated by Islamic fundamentalists for many years, since some of his books poke gentle fun at his faith. And just a few weeks ago, the 83-year-old genius — and he is a wonderful, poetic, unforgettable writer — was stabbed in the neck and nearly murdered by — guess who?

Now, this really freaks me out (to use the medical term). Here is this glorious faith, with which we share Abraham and a passionate belief in monotheism, prayer and tzedakah; yet it has this weird strain of intolerance — even murderous rage — directed against writers who are seen to be "slighting," much less mocking, the religion of Islam.

So I thought to myself, look at the Jews! They have been mocked plenty by countless writers who share their religion. Yet I've never heard of a single Jewish author/poet/playwright who has had a contract on his life taken out. It just doesn't happen, does it? (And I'm sure there have been some Jews who would know what a "contract on someone's life" constitutes.)

But just in case we Jews get a bit testy, like our Islamic brethren (and sistren), and start "losing our cool" (to use the Talmudic phrase), here are some modest suggestions, should our people finally want to take revenge against difficult Jewish authors:

If Phillip Roth really angers us with his next book about the Jews, maybe we should get his home phone number and call him up a thousand times every day, and endlessly demand donations to the UJA. That would serve him right.

If Isaac Bashevis Singer had offended some Yiddish readers with his often sexy short stories and novels, maybe we should have stood outside his West Side Manhattan apartment and shouted out classic Yiddish curses, but always mixing them up in a cruel and vicious manner, such as: "You should grow like a chandelier, with your feet in the ceiling and hang by night." (Yelling them out in the worst Litvak-ish accent, too.)

If Bernard Malamud troubled many Jewish readers with his often nasty descriptions of Lower East-Side Jews, they should have cornered him in a fancy restaurant and switched his fancy, treif wine with a sickly-sweet kosher wine, and simply ruined his dinner.

If Mordecai Richler contines to anger countless Canadian Jews with his satirical description of money-grubbing Jews and irritating Israelis, maybe we should kidnap him from his home in Montreal, fly him to the Holy Land, tie him to a chair in the back of the Knesset, and force him to sit through hours and hours of debates over education, charitable institutions and sewer projects. If that didn't make him vow to leave the Jews alone and only make fun of Canadians from then on, what would?

True, none of these (savage, brutal) actions really come close to what fundamentalists have tried to do to Rushdie and Mahfouz — but maybe that's the whole point. We Jews really do know how to take a joke. (Thank heavens.)

Allan Gould is the author of 21 books, including a major anthology of Canadian comedy, The Great Big Book of Canadian Humor. His latest, which just came out, is Criminal Acts, a Canadian True Crime Annual, published by Macmillan. And if you don't like his humor, please don't kill him; it's just not the Jewish thing to do. But be warned: He already supports the UJA and just loves sickly-sweet kosher wine.

Former enemies cooperate

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Once adversaries in war, Israel and Egypt are now partners in peace.

Egypt has played an integral role in the Madrid peace process since 1991. But it wasn't too long ago that Egypt and Israel were bitterly locked in battle.

Until 1973, they were seemingly irreconcilable enemies, having fought each other in the 1948 War of Independence, the 1956 Sinai Campaign, the 1967 Six Day War, the 1968-70 War of Attrition and the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

But with the close of the 1973 war and the subsequent signing of disengagement agreements obliging the Israeli army to withdraw from segments of the Sinai Peninsula, Israel and Egypt gradually moved toward a rapprochement.

In 1977, President Anwar al-Sadat of Egypt visited Israel and spoke of his desire for peace. Two years later, Egypt and Israel signed a formal peace treaty, an event that angered much of the Arab world and heightened Egypt's isolation in the region.

Since the late 1980s, however, Egypt has returned to prominence in the Arab world, taking a leading role in promoting a diplomatic solution to the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Sadat's successor, Hosni Mubarak, was in the forefront of the Madrid peace process, was privy to Israel's secret talks with the PLO and today plays a strong supporting role as a mediator between Israel and the PLO and Israel and Syria.

Egypt's efforts are universally recognized.

In his recently-published book, The New Middle East, Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres praised the Egyptians.

Last year, when Israel and the PLO ran into an impasse in their negotiations, Nabil Sha'ath, a senior Palestinian official, observed: "Whenever things get complicated, we resort to Egyptian diplomacy to help resolve the complex issues..."

Egypt has been actively involved in the search for a Mideast settlement since the late 1970s.

In concert with Israel and the United States, the Egyptians tried, without success, to lay the groundwork for Palestinian autonomy in the territories.

During the 1980s, Egypt was influential in persuading the PLO to moderate its policy toward Israel. Egypt, too, pressed for a practical Palestinian autonomy plan.

After the Gulf War, Egypt convinced the Palestinians to attend the Madrid peace conference as part of a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation.

Furthermore, Egypt helped nudge Syria into participating in that forum. Egypt firmly believes that Syria must be part and parcel of the peace process, else it will work to scuttle it.

For good reason, Egypt derived immense satisfaction from Israel's September 1993 Declaration of Principles (DoP) with the PLO.

Egypt, which had consistently urged Israel to negotiate with the PLO, acted as an advisor to the Palestinians throughout the secret talks in Norway.

Egypt played key role in peace process

And once Israel and the PLO sat down to translate the DoP into a viable accord, the discussions often took place in Cairo. Indeed, last May's agreement which formally sanctioned Palestinian autonomy in the West Bank town of Jericho and the Gaza Strip was signed in Cairo in a ceremony attended by, among others, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and PLO chairman Yasser Arafat.

But since the peace process is far from complete, Egypt continues to play a crucial role in maintaining the momentum toward a comprehensive settlement. The Egyptian government, spearheaded by Mubarak and Foreign Minister Amr Moussa, regularly consults with the PLO as well as with Syria. And before the PLO took control of the autonomous areas, Egypt was in the vanguard of training Palestinian policemen and civil servants slated to serve in Jericho and Gaza.

Cairo's highly visible diplomacy is a function of Egypt's desire to bring peace, stability and prosperity to the Mideast, to ensure that its treaty with Israel is not a contentious issue in inter-Arab politics, and to assert its leadership of the Arab world.

The underlying tenets of Egyptian policy are clear — the resolution of conflict by political means, the respect for the territorial integrity of all states and the need for a just solution to the Palestinian problem.

It's also clear, however, that Egypt could never have aspired to be an effective Arab-Israeli broker had it not broken out of its regional isolation.

Being the most populous Arab state and a centre of Arab national identity and culture, Egypt was for decades the natural leader of the Arab world.

This was particularly true from the mid-1950s onward, when Gamel Abdel Nasser ruled Egypt, writes Gregory Aftandilian in Egypt's Bid For Arab Leadership (Council on Foreign Relations, $14.95, US).

A charismatic leader, Nasser gained enormous popularity through his decision to nationalize the Suez Canal Company; his role in the non-aligned movement; his opposition to the pro-Western Baghdad Pact; and his stand against Israel.

Egypt's humiliating defeat in the Six Day War effectively ended the era of Egyptian dominance in the Arab world. Nevertheless, Egypt remained a major player in Arab affairs.

By virtue of its initial victories in the Yom Kippur War, Egypt's status as the preeminent Arab power was greatly enhanced. But its position was short-lived. Sadat's historic journey to Jerusalem, his decision to sign the Camp David Accords and his peace treaty with Israel prompted most Arab countries to sever ties with Egypt and to transfer Arab League headquarters from Cairo to Tunis.

Egypt's ostracism did not last long.

Iraq's 1980-88 war with Iran was an important factor in Egypt's reinstatement. That war, as Aftandilian writes, diverted attention away from Egypt's treaty with Israel. It demonstrated that Iran — a nation controlled by Islamic fundamentalists — was a clear and present danger to Arab regimes.

The Iran-Iraq War also enabled Egypt to funnel military aid to Baghdad, an act that markedly improved Egypt's image in Arab capitals, and diluted Iraq's opposition to the Camp David Accords.

The development of a more pragmatic Arab approach to Israel, underlined by the PLO's recognition of Israel and its acceptance of United Nations resolution 242, contributed to Egypt's rehabilitation.

By 1990, Egypt had re-established relations with all those Arab countries that had broken them off in the wake of Sadat's trip to Jerusalem. And the Arab League moved back to Cairo.

Iraq's invasion and annexation of Kuwait provided Egypt with yet one more opportunity to bury the past.

The Iraqi thrust was not a direct threat to Egypt's strategic interests. But it did allow Egypt to challenge Iraqi hegemony, to exercise leadership and to ingratiate itself with the United States (which channels $3 billion worth of military and economic aid to Cairo annually).

In Aftandilian's view, Iraq's defeat in the war had two consequences. It allowed Egypt to re-emerge as the strongest Arab military power, with Syria not far behind. And it lent more credence to Egypt's treaty with Israel and legitimized Egypt's efforts to end the Arab-Israeli imbroglio through non-violent means.

With the peace process on track, despite the upsurge of extremist Palestinian terrorism, Egypt's role as a mediator is bound to expand.

Egypt seems equal to the task. Egypt, Amr Moussa declared recently, "will not leave an obstacle unremoved, a path untrodden, nor a horizon unexplored" in its attempt to enlarge the parameters of peace in the Middle East.

Mideast Analysis

By Sheldon Kirshner

Yitzhak Shamir, the prime minister of Israel until July 1992, has written his autobiography, Summing Up (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $39.95). He reveals much of himself and even bares his soul.

Shamir evokes his childhood in Poland, his flight to Palestine, his days as a Revisionist Zionist fighter, his barren years as a book-keeper, his entry into party politics, and his tenure as foreign minister and premier.

Summing Up, which is competently written, is arranged in chronological order, beginning with his birth in 1915 in Rujenoy, a town of 5,000 with 3,500 Jewish inhabitants.

Educated exclusively in Hebrew, Shamir, like his parents, was an early Zionist. Poland, not to mention Polish language and culture, were secondary to him.

Shamir emigrated to Palestine in 1935, leaving behind his family. They perished during the Holocaust, murdered by the Nazis after having been betrayed by local collaborators.

Fired up by the Irgun Zvai Leumi's philosophy, Shamir joined that radical right-wing Zionist organization. Later, Shamir joined the Stern Gang, a far-right offshoot of the Irgun. Rounded up by the British during World War II, he and his colleagues were exiled to Ethiopia. There they languished until their daring escape. Back in Palestine by 1947, Shamir resumed his anti-British activities.

With Jewish statehood achieved and Israel governed by a party which had abhorred the Irgun and its ideology, Shamir's future looked uncertain. Indeed, he was bluntly told by the State Comptroller's Office that he was not "reliable enough."

Shamir returned to his old profession, bookkeeping, to make ends meet for himself, his wife Shulamit and their children. But it was an arid existence, and during this period, he felt "useless."

In 1955, the "tide turned" when an old Irgun friend recruited him into the Mossad. Shamir spent a decade with the Mossad, which, he says, changed him. True to form, he provides what is at best a rudimentary outline of his cloak-and-dagger days.

In 1970, Shamir entered the ranks of the Herut party, led by Menachem Begin. Shamir was elected to the Knesset in 1973, and in 1977 he became the Speaker.

Shamir, a hawk, was appointed foreign minister in 1980, following Moshe Dayan's resignation. Shamir claims he never imagined that he might succeed the ailing Begin as prime minister. However, he points out, he was psychologically prepared for the promotion.

He makes no apologies for his views. The Jewish settlers had his "total backing." He was loath to relinquish Taba, Israel's last enclave in the Sinai. He was determined to block the demand by George Bush, the American president, for Israel's withdrawal from Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip.

Devoting a chapter to the 1991 Gulf War, Shamir admits that the pressure of events was "close to unbearable." In an epilogue, Shamir comes out squarely against Israel's 1993 Declaration of Principles with the PLO. "These developments," he warns in a book which defines his persona and his ideological convictions, "bear within them the seeds of disaster for the Jewish state."

Rabbinical Reflections

By RABBI ELYSE M. GOLDSTEIN

I am the original Chanukah Scrooge. I am the official Bah Humbug of Bathurst. I view every human kindness in the month of December with suspicion. I do not go into the malls any time after the first of November, even if G-d forbid I should need a pair of socks.

Whenever I go into the grocery store, I wear my walkman and smile as I sing along with my favorite tape.

I know many religious Christians who hate the materialism and trivilization of their holy day. What I hate more is the way Chanukah has come to compete, and the way it has been cheapened and commercialized. Will we soon take our kids to the mall to get their pictures taken with Judah Maccabee?

Parents often come to me asking if they should agree to well-meaning teachers' requests to come in with a menorah and speak about Chanukah. My answer? Only if you go into the schools to teach about our real holy days, Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur, and Pesach, Sukkot and Shavuot, and all the others.

Chanukah has gotten a top billing it doesn't deserve. Traditionally Chanukah is counted among the minor festivals, one on which even the most observant are allowed to drive, work, and cook. Even the first and last days of Chanukah, on other festivals considered to be holy, are not.

The Torah, of course, knows nothing of Chanukah. The Talmud records the story of a little jar of oil as the reason lights are lit on Chanukah, and yet the Talmud makes no mention of these lights as signifying a major religious festival.

Clearly, Christmas had not yet taken on gargantuan proportions and Chanukah remained a minor day — up until the modern period, when it has been forced out of its little slumber into the national consciousness of Jews and Christians alike.

When I light the menorah in my home, I light the fires of Jewish religious freedom that the Maccabees fought for; light the spiritual message of Zechariah read on the Shabbat of Chanukah, "Not by might, not by power, but by My spirit shall there be peace, says the Lord;" I light it to "publicize the miracle."

Our job is not to make Chanukah equal to Christmas — it can never win that contest. The more we accept that challenge from the stores and workplaces and public schools, and the more we foster it ourselves, the more disappointed we will become. Christmas will always be grander; there is a whole industry to be sure of that.

The resigned, "Well, we have Chanukah," is not the answer. We have Shabbat every week, and a Sukkah we decorate, and hamantaschen on Purim to deliver to friends and neighbors, and Tu b'Shevat to plant trees, and Selichot when we stay up until midnight to greet the season of our New Year — that is the answer.

I suppose, in the final analysis, we will not succeed in fighting the comparisons between Chanukah and Christmas. The stores will continue to place chanukiot next to Frosty the Snowman. There will probably continue to be a giant menorah at Queens Park, followed a month later by a giant tree.

(Although personally I've always imagined a more successful campaign of public awareness about Judaism would be to hoist a woman up a hydraulic lift each Erev Shabbat before sunset to light 30-foot-high candles.)

A fuss is not made over our truly important days; and if one song of a Jewish composer is played near Rosh Hashanah in honor of the Jewish New Year, we're lucky.

As Chanukah threatens to merge into Christmas, will our other holidays be diminished because they aren't lucky enough to fall during a Christian or secular season?

Why am I such a Scrooge, even about Chanukah? Can't our children have parties, decorate the windows with Happy Chanukah signs, get gifts? Absolutely!

But I assume those same youngsters are getting dressed up for Purim and coming to hear the megillah, and learning to fast on Yom Kippur, to say the four questions on Passover and light candles each week for Shabbat.

Perhaps we Jews are trying to make ourselves feel just a little better this awkward time of year by insisting that our symbols get national coverage too. But our culture is not a Jewish one, and to pretend it is once a year is a self deceit bound to make us not more comfortable, but more uncomfortable.

I look forward to the time when the carols and the little dreidel song won't compete, and we Jews will celebrate all our festivals with as much public pride as Chanukah — which each year looms larger and larger as it strays further and further from its original Maccabean struggle against the forces of assimilation.

Israel, Jordan to open embassies

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel and Jordan are due to open embassies on Dec. 10, Israel Radio reported last week.

A Foreign Ministry delegation was in Amman last week to discuss economic issues and look for an appropriate site for the embassy.

The Itim news agency reported that ministry officials would meet at the beginning of next month to appoint Israel's first ambassador to Jordan. The nominee has been the subject of much speculation in Israel.

Meanwhile, one of the economic projects the Israeli team was discussing is the proposed "Peace Valley" in the Dead Sea area, which will include hotels and resorts.

Bachelors strut their stuff for Anshei Minsk

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — My great-grandmother, who used to attend services at Anshei Minsk Congregation, could never have imagined anything like the Orthodox shul's most recent fundraiser.

But her daughter (my late grandmother) would surely have relished the dramatic parade of 22 tuxedo-clad eligible men at the second annual Jewish Bachelor Auction.

The oversized ballroom of the Crowne Plaza Hotel (formerly L'Hotel) held a standing-room-only crowd of over 500 people Nov. 10.

The $20-a-ticket evening ($25 at the door), which also included a silent auction, raised about $15,000 for basic shul maintenance fees and further singles programming.

The historic 65-year-old synagogue building, located on St. Andrews Street downtown, serves a sizable population of Jewish singles.

"It's worth every penny to [help] this shul," said bachelor Jason Rodney, 26.

"Even if you have to go out with somebody gorgeous," added Chava Mandlsohn, a 23-year-old teacher and friend of the 6'2" graphic engineer.

She had jokingly offered to bid on him if nobody else did, but Rodney's entrance on his red Yamaha Maxim motorcycle left no doubt the women in the audience found him appealing.

In fact, none of the pre-screened bachelors, ranging in age from 25 to 63, needed to fear for lack of bids.

"He looks good for his age," commented one audience member of Marvin Starr, 63, well-known in Toronto for his eponymous car dealership.

Successful bids

"A cornucopia of male pulchritude, [or] a bunch of young hunks and hunks who think young," was emcee Jonathan Miller's description of the bachelors. Miller, whose booming British accent could be heard without a microphone, was a surprise "mystery" bachelor.

The shul's spiritual leader, Rabbi Schmuel Spero, joked that he was disqualified as a bachelor because of the length of his beard.

Bidding, led by professional auctioneer Ira Hopmeyer, started at $50 or $100, and went as high as $430.

Brief presentations by each bachelor ranged from the sweet to the raunchy, although the latter aspect was neither anticipated nor condoned by the organizers, The CJN was told.

Thirty-four-year-old Asher Fine's appearance on the stage prompted appreciative sighs when the Orthodox landscape contractor said he loves "giving, sharing and deep conversations."

Three women successfully bid on two dates each. One of them was Eva Ryterband, a thirtysomething businesswoman who paid $140 to see Don Pasquale with Marsh Gould, 47, and $250 to see The Mousetrap and go to the Park Plaza Hotel's Rooftop Lounge with Raphael Lindsay, 40.

"I'm fortunate to be able to contribute to Jewish causes in a significant way," said Ryterband.

Special guests at the auction were Joanna Duby, 29, and her husband Paul Michaels, 30. They met at the first bachelor auction, where both were audience members, and married this June.

March of Living students join Kristallnacht service

TORONTO — March of the Living participants spoke at a moving Kristallnacht service held Nov. 9 at Toronto's Congregational Habonim.

The synagogue, founded by German Jewish Holocaust survivors, holds a Kristallnacht service every November.

Approximately 250 people listened to 17-year-old York Mills Collegiate students Erin Norris and Elyse Korman read from journals of their trip to Poland and Israel earlier this year. Both said it was the responsibility of the next generation to remember.

"Poland, the camps and everything that we have seen will have become a part of us so that in the next generation we will be the ones who will pass on the stories. We will be the survivors," Korman said.

Rabbi Mark Dratch, spiritual leader of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim synagogue and a chaperon on the '94 March, delivered the keynote address.

John Patton spoke of what happened to him on Nov. 9, 1938, the night hundreds of synagogues were burned across the Third Reich, 91 Jews killed and thousands arrested.

Patton, 20 at the time, was in Vienna at his uncle's home when he was woken by Nazi henchmen at 4 a.m. and deported to Dachau.

The evening also featured an interpretive dance to the music of Schindler's List , Holocaust songs sung by the Habonim Youth Choir, and memorial prayers recited by Cantor Albert Feldman.

The event was co-sponsored by the March of the Living and by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto's 14th annual Holocaust Education Week.

Feld Carr makes impact at chapel dinner

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Only a handful of the 300 guests at Steeles Memorial Chapel's recent annual dinner were women, but it was a woman who made the biggest impact.

Judy Feld Carr's speech was the highlight of the evening. She accepted a donation from the funeral home for the Dr. Ronald Feld Fund for Jews in Arab Lands, which has provided aid to Syrian Jews for over 20 years.

There was a hush in the room when chapel board member John Pollock introduced Carr. "Judy, or Miss Judy as she is known in the Syrian community, has been singularly responsible for the rescue of close to 3,000 Jewish men, women and children," Pollock said.

Carr told the audience she used money from the Beth Tzedec Congregation-based Feld fund to run an escape route and to bribe officials to get Jews out of Syria.

"A Jew was for sale for a price and I was buying," she said. "We paid the ransom for every single person who could not pay the ransom themselves."

She said she could now talk about her once-secret work because her mission was almost complete. Over the past two years, almost all the Jews of Syria have left the country. While some elderly Jews have chosen to remain, there are only 62 people — all from one small village — still to come, Carr said.

The Feld Fund also supports Syrian Jews living in the Diaspora waiting to make aliyah. Many live in New York.

Judy Feld Carr

The fund was one of 80 community organizations and charities that received money from Steeles Memorial Chapel this year. Mike Rogow, president of the funeral home's board of directors, said $125,000 had been distributed.

The largest sums went to Sunnybrook Hospital — $15,000 for a chapel — and to the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, where $36,000 was pledged for a hospital room.

Pinchas Gutter, president of the Men's Service Group at Baycrest, accepted the pledge on behalf of the hospital.

"We're here for one reason," Rogow told the audience. "To give away most of our profits to charity."

The funeral home, a non-profit organization, was set up in 1927 to keep burial costs down. It distributes its profits at the annual dinner.

This event, a yearly tradition for 27 years, draws people from a wide range of Jewish organizations. "I wouldn't miss it for the world," Metro Councillor Howard Moscoe told The CJN. "It brings the entire spectrum of the Jewish community together."

Norm Gardner, another Metro councillor, also attended.

Holocaust survivor Abe Schwebel told The CJN he was touched by Carr's speech because so few people today are willing to make sacrifices. "She deserves to be called aishet chayil [a righteous woman]," he said.

Cantor Martin Rosenblum, also a survivor, told The CJN that 50 years ago, Romania wanted to sell 70,000 Jews but "there were no buyers.

"I wish we would have had a Judy Feld Carr 50 years ago. She could not have prevented the Holocaust, but many Jews could have been saved."

Shabbat services at Shalom Village

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Under a welcome new program, Jewish organizations for all ages are sponsoring Shabbat services for the residents of Shalom Village and the adjacent Shalom Village nursing home.

Shalom Village is the only Jewish facility serving Hamilton and surrounding communities.

Before the program began last March, it was difficult for residents to attend nearby synagogue services, which often are too long, social services worker Shelley Waxman told The CJN.

Waxman, who runs the program, said residents now have a Shabbat service every month "and they're booked up to the end of February."

The cost of sponsoring a service, which includes a "nice, heimish kiddush lunch," is $200.

The organization also provides volunteers to set up the basement room, which has an Aron Kodesh and a Torah, escort residents to the one-hour service, serve lunch and clean up. Staff usually help.

Halifax memorial service disappoints organizer

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Larry Riteman was guarded in his analysis of the third annual Dignity Day, held in Halifax Nov. 9 to remember Jews robbed of their dignity by the Nazis and to recognize those who fought in World War II.

"I am a bit disappointed this event is not growing beyond the Jewish community," he said after public figures and private citizens lit candles to remember Kristallnacht, the Nov. 9, 1938, night when Germans destroyed Jewish communities throughout that country. "This should be of more concern to the general community."

Riteman, Atlantic regional chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Holocaust rememberance committee, has organized all first three Dignity Days in Halifax.

"I feel we're running out of time on this event," he said. "It is 49 years since the [end of the] war. Next year, people will focus on 50th anniversary dates ... In the years following, they will start thinking about the Cold War, the hardness of the late 1940s and 1950s, and maybe we will have lost the opportunity to make an event like this spontaneous."

The 50 people attending Dignity Day events met at Nova Scotia's Province House (home of the legislative assembly) and marched, with lit candles, the short distance to the downtown cenotaph where provincial and civic leaders, including newly-elected Jewish alderman Jerry Blumenthal, placed candles.

"It was encouraging to see so many teens and young adults attending," Riteman said. "Maybe we can keep this going."

Dalhousie University student Jodi Lassner of Montreal, one of several speakers, said "We are here 56 years after Kristallnacht, to ensure that history will not be forgotten and not be repeated."

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

Adoption: The Russian Way

Everyone knows that Jews are into family in a big way, which essentially means kids. In fact, the very essentials of worldly survival are listed in the Talmud as "Banai, chayai, u'mezonai": children, health, and sustenance, with children coming first.

But what happens when naches doesn't happen? Torah even compares childlessness to death. Three of our four matriarchs had to pray for decades to be blessed with children. Several took the adoption option with birth mothers involved throughout, these being the earliest examples of "open" adoption, commonly considered the "innovation" of modern sociologists.

Today adoption is still a live issue in the Jewish community. Of the 14,000 Ontarians on adoption waiting lists, many are Jewish.

The wait for Ontario adoptions is some 7 to 10 years, and comparably bleak horizons confront the childless in the rest of Canada as well. International adoptions have increased in popularity because they take just a few months, but there are pluses and minuses. They cost considerably more than local adoptions, and international facilitators are not deemed subject to provincial adoption regulations. Moreover, there have been numerous convictions for improper fees and procedures, involving lawyers, social workers and facilitators, operating locally as well as internationally. Recently many countries have been tightening up their adoption regulations in accordance with the Hague Convention guidelines on the protection of children's rights.

In future articles I hope to highlight different legitimate services.

One promising venue is a relatively new agency called "Canadian Homes for Russian Children" (CHRC), a charitable organization run by Lubavitchers serving both Jews and non-Jews. Jewish children are placed in Jewish homes, and non-Jewish children can be placed either in Jewish or non-Jewish homes. The service is based in Toronto (tel. (416)667-7666).

Of special interest to the Jewish community is that CHRC can often clarify the Jewishness of the adoptee based on research prior to the adoption. Jewish identity can be difficult to ascertain since Russian criteria for Jewish identity are non-halachic.

In the past two months, CHRC has placed six children aged one through four years. The children were all wards of state in Russian orphanages. These children were all abandoned, but others are removed from unfit parents, or are actual orphans. Children are identified by CHRC field staff who circulate among government agencies and orphanages, identifying children available for international adoption.

Adoptive applicants in Canada receive photos and detailed medical information on the children. Once a proposal is accepted, the adopters delegate limited power of attorney to a CHRC staffer who handles the approvals and stands before the Court overseeing the adoption. When the adoption is complete, the Russian government invites the adoptive applicants to come to Russia to pick up their child, and one or both parents fly to Russia for a week's stay. The paperwork is typically done in a day and the rest of the time is spent getting to know the child and experiencing the culture. Typically, the provincial and federal Canadian governments process immigration for the child to Canada beforehand.

This service has a number of other advantages. As international adoption becomes more regulated, foreign governments are showing a preference for non-profit organizations over independent facilitators. Also, the financial arrangements with a CHRC adoption are advantageous in that the funds paid to CHRC are held in corporate trust pending the completion of the adoption. Moreover, some of the fees may be legitimate charitable donations and result in deductions from taxes payable. However, you would be best to consult a qualified accountant before attempting to claim such deductions.

Vancouver leader to be honored

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Arthur Fouks, a pioneer member of the Jewish community and one of the founders of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, will be honored at a black tie community tribute dinner to be held Nov. 29 at the Four Seasons Hotel.

The event will launch the Ancie and Arthur Fouks Jewish Continuity Endowment Fund, to be administered through the Federation "to provide the resources for programs and services which fall outside of the agency's funding guidelines, or when there is simply a lack of funds."

Fouks told the Federation magazine it is the first time in his more than 50 years of community involvement that he has agreed to lend his name to a fundraising dinner.

"I agreed to the request of Peter Oreck and Risa Levine, because I feel deeply about an endowment fund," he said. "Risa and Peter asked me to lend my name because they said it will help to ensure an effective kickoff to the fund."

A lawyer by profession, Fouks grew up in Vancouver in the 1920s "with a very strong Jewish family background. My Jewish education came from cheder and the Schaarey Tzedeck synagogue where I was bar mitzvahed."

Fouks says he is not a religious Jew — "in fact I call myself a cardiac Jew, a Jew at heart." But he is a strong believer in Jewish education for the younger generation "as they are the key to the future. Their education is our responsibility, as parents and as members of the community.

Keynote speaker at the dinner will be Shoshana Cardin, chair of the National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership, and national chair of the United Israel Appeal of the United States.

Documentary on Bergen-Belsen reveals horrors

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — A documentary on the death and burial of thousands of Holocaust victims at Bergen-Belsen sent waves of revulsion through the large audience at a Holocaust memorial.

The meeting at the Jewish Community Centre was arranged by the Victoria Holocaust Education Remembrance Society.

Peter Gary, a survivor and founder of the society, said the film obtained from the Royal British Military Archives was an unedited version, made in April 1945, of the experience of British troops who came to Bergen-Belsen to rescue the inmates who remained.

Narrated by actor Trevor Howard, the film told of the 30,000 dead whose naked bodies were scattered all over the camp, apparently for weeks, as undernourished prisoners tried to bury them. Supervising the burials were SS guards and 500 Hungarian troops.

The victims had been murdered through systematic starvation or killed by an epidemic of typhus spread by lice.

More than 200 children under 12, some of them born behind the barbed wire fences of the camp, were among the dead.

When the British troops arrived, they restored the water supply, which had been cut off for six days, and ordered the Nazis to take on the task of burying the dead. Survivors were taken to British field hospitals, after being deloused.

The film shows the Nazis, males and females, bulldozing huge pits and throwing in bodies — usually 500 to a pit. Each pit was given a number and listed the number of bodies it held.

Said the commentator: "There were Jews, Lutherans and Catholics among the dead. We'll never know who they were ... All the faiths were buried cheek to cheek."

Officials and leading citizens from nearby towns were brought as witnesses and "it was not what they expected to see."

One official screamed at the Nazis, "You are responsible for these deaths and you will pay for it."

"There seemed no end to the burials. Even after seven days the grisly task continued," said Howard.

Principal speaker at the memorial was Dr. William Nicholls, retired head of the department of religious studies at the University of British Columbia and a founder of the Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region's annual Holocaust education days in B.C. universities and high schools.

Nicholls, who recently published Christian Anti-Semitism, a History of Hate, said the Holocaust was without parallel in history in its significance and horror. He called it "an absolutely irrational operation, carried out by sophisticated intellectuals."

Nicholls called for massive re-education of society. "High school children are our best hope and the most likely to respond" to a new code of human decency, he said.

He called for repentance by "all Christian communions" for their historical treatment of Jews. "It's a moral imperative as a means to revitalize Christianity itself," he said.

Making the going easier

The Institute for Community Education and Referral, conceived and funded by Benjamin's, was created in 1986. Benjamin's felt that the sanctity of life demonstrated in treatment of the deceased had to be reflected in greater care for the living as well. The Institute fills, in part, the vacuum left by vanishing traditions of community support for people adjusting to great or sudden personal loss.

The Institute serves as an educational resource on death, funeral practices and Jewish laws and traditions, in addition to helping with needed attention. Individuals or families served by the Chapel may receive clinical assessments, short-term psychological support or referrals to accredited professionals upon request or at the suggestion of the director at the time arrangements are made. Counselling costs are either fully borne or subsidized by Benjamin's to reduce any barrier to help.

Several mailings describing the Institute's services are sent out well after a funeral. Some people need time before recognizing the need for, or accepting professional help. Families occasionally contact the agency for help in coping before a loss occurs. Whatever information or clinical services may be required, the Benjamin Institute is a unique community resource dedicated to facilitating the way life goes on.

Abella slams Canada's treatment of war refugees

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — The nations of the world failed abysmally to help the Jews during the Nazi regime and afterward.

And Canada had the worst record of all in refusing to help Jews in the 1930s and 1940s, declared Irving Abella, national president of Canadian Jewish Congress, at a Kristallnacht service here at Congregation Emanu-El.

Abella said he had had no knowledge of Canada's record when he and Harold Troper began the research for their book on the country's treatment of refugees.

He said he was shown thousands of letters in the archives in Ottawa from "the cream of European crop," skilled professionals, who pleaded for entry to Canada. But appended to each letter was a note from the federal department of immigration stating: "Sorry, at the present time Canada is not admitting Jews."

Rabbi Victor Reinstein, of Congregation Emanu-El, added his criticism of the world's civilized nations, pointing out that "even after the Allies fought the Nazis and all they represented, a strain of the same cancer of anti-Semitism kept the doors closed to Jews throughout the world."

He said Hitler had accurately gauged the response of the world to Kristallnacht, which marked the beginning of the destruction of European Jews. Beyond high-sounding rhetoric, little was done to open doors to the stricken Jews.

The Kristallnacht service was one of the largest ever held in Victoria, with an overflow crowd from the Jewish and general communities.

Victoria city council passed a resolution unanimously proclaiming Nov. 9-10, as Kristallnacht Days of Commemoration. The resolution said that Kristallnacht "conveys the unique urgency and responsibility of good people to speak out and act before racism begins its cancerous spread, and with it the risk of racism and of Holocaust denial."

Abella said Kristallnacht has an unforgettable place in Jewish history. The pretext for the destruction was the assassination of a German diplomat in Paris by a young Polish Jewish refugee. It was the excuse the Nazis wanted officially to pounce on the Jews.

Steffi Porzecanski, a Victoria survivor, lived in Berlin at the time.

> 'We must offer our children more than the ability to survive'

The next morning, "the sidewalks were full of glass," she recalled, "and I saw flames shooting out of my synagogue. I saw the firefighters standing around merely looking on. Some firemen directed sparks to an adjacent building which was part of the synagogue."

Abella called the loss of the six million "inconceivable indifference" by the nations of the world.

He said Jews cannot now be indifferent to what happened.

Abella called on the younger generation to learn about the creative and thriving Jewish life that existed in Europe before the war. "We must offer our children more than the ability to survive. Our major challenge must be to build a Jewish community of social justice, compassion and equity. We must take pride in our traditions."

As part of the service, Yahrzeit candles were lit to recall the communities some Victoria survivors came from: Berlin, Breslau, Vienna, Paris, Warsaw and Stairi Sambor.

Psychologist helps deal with trauma

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Many Israelis have been psychologically traumatized through exposure to frightening events like terrorist bombings, hijackings and missile attacks, according to a clinical psychologist at Jerusalem's Ezrath Nashim Sarah Herzog Memorial Hospital.

People who experience terrorist episodes, car accidents or other traumatic events go into "survival mode," Dr. Danny Brom told The CJN during a recent visit to Toronto.

"They do exactly what is necessary to survive. It's actually amazing how well people behave during the most stressful periods of trauma. When the event is over, only then do their knees start to tremble and they start to feel the anxiety."

Normally, the healing process does not begin until the source of the trauma is removed, Brom said. "People don't start coping with their experiences unless they feel it's safe to do so."

After Brom arrived in Israel from his native Holland in 1988, he found that Israeli doctors downplayed trauma as a serious problem, chiefly because few Israelis were ready to discuss their traumatic symptoms.

"They would say, 'At our clinic, trauma doesn't play a role.' And it was true. Most people weren't talking about it. Holocaust survivors have written about a conspiracy of silence. It's the same in the field of trauma in general."

In the last few months, Brom and others trained to deal with traumatic effects have seen an increase in the number of Israelis ready to deal with old traumatic memories. "I think it's because there is something in the air that says peace is almost here," he said.

"On Israeli television during the peace signing with Jordan, many people told of things they went through during the war with Jordan — how they had been to Jordan already but in uniform and in a tank. . . . They're opening up about it now."

Only 10 to 20 per cent of those who experience a frightening event may have difficulty dealing with it later on, Brom said. Long term symptoms include mentally reliving the event, experiencing intrusive images or nightmares, and fear of the event happening again.

People with "unprocessed traumatic memories" may also consciously attempt to forget the event and avoid speaking about it or visiting the site where it occurred.

"We're still studying the hard lessons of the Holocaust, because they give us a chance to look at the very long term consequences of a very specific traumatic occurrence. For so many years, people were not given the opportunity to talk about the things they went through and their feelings about them. That has led to many difficult situations."

According to Brom, traumas have common properties. "There are practitioners in Canada who say, 'I treat victims of violence but I don't know anything about grief.' And others may say, 'I treat women who have been raped, but I don't know anything about traffic accidents.'

"My approach, which I think is gaining acceptance in professional circles, is that the basic pattern of coping is similar, and that if you know one thing you shouldn't be afraid of another. Of course the content is different, but the pattern is the same."

While in Toronto, Brom spoke to a group of lay people in a private home, and again to a group of medical professionals at the Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto, which is affiliated with Ezrath Nashim-Herzog Hospital.

Change said always better than rest

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Some may think a change is as good as a rest, but according to stress management and lifestyle counsellor Dr. David Posen, a change is better.

Author of Always Change a Losing Game, published by Key Porter Books, Posen told a recent audience at the Jewish Book Fair that change is a fact of life.

"Change is becoming more rapid and widespread and rather than fighting it, we should see it as a pay-off," he said.

Posen said too often people do things that hurt them. "They keep playing games the same way, even though they lose. Whether it's compulsive eating, an addiction to caffeine, worrying over little things or being stuck in an unhappy relationship or dead-end job, they know they should change their losing habits but don't know where, or how, to begin."

Posen, who 10 years ago at age 42, gave up his family practice in favor of stress management and lifestyle counselling, told a story about playing tennis with his brother.

Type A behavior

"I would stand at the baseline and hit the ball as hard as I could. I lost a lot of games that way and one day my brother suggested I play the net and take the offensive. I was reluctant since volleying wasn't one of my strengths. That is when he pointed out that since I wasn't winning anyway, I really didn't have much more to lose. 'Always change a losing game,' he said."

He said people who display Type A behavior — aggressive, competitive and hard-driving — need to learn to balance work and leisure, and their needs with the needs of others.

Another losing game, according to Posen, is having unrealistic expectations about oneself and about other people. "Do your best, be cautious and careful, and rectify your mistakes." He said such a strategy would lead to less conflicts with children.

Posen cited nagging as another strategy that does not work in dealing with others. "Stop using it ... Nagging often solidifies a problem and makes it worse."

He encouraged audience members to explore their lives and discover what areas need change. "By changing these losing games, you will find that life works better."

Jewish War Veterans hold parade, service

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The route from Earl Bales Park to Beth Radom Synagogue may have been just three blocks long, but a long procession of people marched in the recent Rememberance Day parade organized by the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Toronto Post.

Five hundered war veterans, Armed Forces cadets and members of the Metropolitian Toronto Police force joined in the parade and services at North York's Beth Radom synagogue.

The service included a tribute to Todd Baylis, the young police constable killed in action five months ago. Sam Pasternack, one of the organizers of this Remembrance Day event, told The CJN the Jewish war veterans honored Baylis because "he was killed so we could walk the streets safely."

Decked out in their tall black busbies and red tartan kilts, the members of the Metro Police Pipes and Drums played Bonnie Dundee and When the Battle's Over as parade marshall Ernest Stein lead the procession past the Yad Vashem memorial and out to Bathurst Street for three blocks to Reiner Road. Metro Police Chief William McCormack took the salute outside the synagogue.

Major-generals Bruce Legge and Brian Vernon, colonels Gre Grewal and Ben Dunkelman, and 30 high-ranking police and Armed Forces officers attended. The veterans served in World War II, Korea and Vietnam.

Other dignitaries included MPPs Elinor Caplan and Charles Harnick; Metro Councillor Norm Gardner; representatives from the British, American and French Consulates; and Brig.-Gen. Doron Kadmiel of the Jewish National Fund.

Over 800 people assembled inside Beth Radom for the special memorial service and candlelighting to honor the soldiers who sacrificed their lives for the cause of freedom.

Ted Baylis, the father of Todd, read Psalm 23 and lit a candle with other members of his family in his son's memory. Baylis later told The CJN he was very moved by the service. "I was very proud that they would honor my son," he said. "I was so overwhelmed I'll be back next year."

Pasternack said the Jewish War veterans had the most "multicultural Remembrance Day ceremonies in the country."

He was pleased with this year's turnout. "It keeps increasing by leaps and bounds each year. It increases by 100 or 200 people a year."

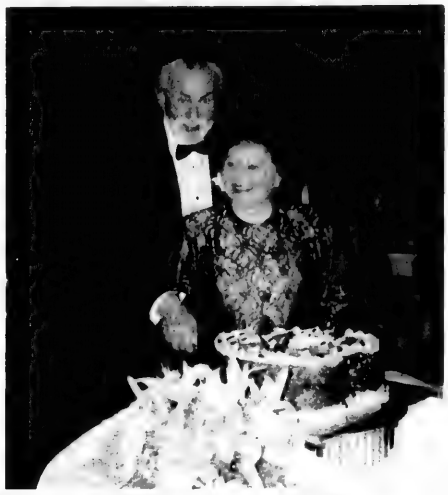
Peretz's mark 50th anniversary in safer surroundings



Erna and Joe Peretz at their wedding in 1944 (left) and at their 50th anniversary.

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Orphaned and alone, on Nov. 5, 1944, Erna Zweig and Jos (Joe) Peretz stood hand in hand under a borrowed tallit and exchanged wedding vows.

A few neighbors and strangers stood with them in the small Antwerp synagogue, the only one spared by the Nazis because its location between row houses made it easy to overlook.

Around them, German bombs exploded in an effort to destroy the port. Erna and Joe vowed that if they lived to see their 50th anniversary, they would make it a grand celebration.

On Nov. 5, 1994, they once again stood together hand in hand, living out their dream — this time under a chupah in the chapel at Temple Sinai.

They were surrounded by their daughter Kitty and her husband Dr. Paul Tepperman, grandchildren Aimee and Marni, with her husband Jason Appel, and 68 friends.

Rabbi Jordan Pearlson officiated as they renewed their wedding vows. "Again I declare that you are more holy and precious to me as my wife then you were as my bride 50 years ago," Joe said.

Throughout the emotion-filled evening, the couple's gratitude dwarfed their sadness of the events of the past.

They met as teenagers at Zionist youth groups. At 21, Joe was sent to a slave-labor camp in northern France to make charcoal for the German army. Before leaving, he gave Erna his bar mitzvah ring and promised to someday replace it with a wedding band. But as the horror stories filtered back, Erna feared Joe would never come back.

Born in Krąkow, Erna's family came to Belgium when she was 4. She was not at home when the Gestapo came for her family. A gentile friend whose niece had died gave Erna the dead woman's papers. Wearing a big cross, she was hired as a nanny in France using the name Josie Sailly.

When the slave-labor camp was cleared out for transfer to Auschwitz in January 1944, Joe escaped when his guard looked away.

After Belgium was liberated in October 1944, Joe and Josie, as Erna was now called, returned to Antwerp, found each other, and hoped and prayed their families would return.

Joe and Josie, who came to Canada in 1953, expressed their gratitude to the righteous gentiles who helped them survive. There were more than 30,000 Jews in Belgium at the beginning of the war. Only a handful survived. Joe's sister Lily, who was born in England and held a British birth certificate, was the only other survivor in both families.

In an interview with The CJN, Josie and Joe told one miraculous story of survival after another. Joe has written a book of his memoirs which he hopes will be published.

Hebrew U Friends turns 50

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University has been celebrating throughout 1994 in honor of its 50th anniversary.

In Montreal, the birthplace of the organization, a Midor L'Dor (From Generation to Generation) party was held in May.

"We have had major events, dinners, fundraisers and celebrations across Canada," said the organization's president Stephen Lipper from his Montreal office.

One highlight was the tribute to Canadian Friends held at the university's board of governors' meeting last June in Jerusalem, he said.

The 13-chapter organization, which has regional offices in Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal, is one of 22 such organizations affiliated with the university. It was founded in 1944 by the late Allan Bronfman to raise awareness and financial support.

Edward Bronfman, who now lives in Toronto and sits on the national executive of the Hebrew University, has childhood memories of his father spending "just about every Sunday afternoon sitting in the sunroom doing Hebrew University business."

Allan Bronfman also brought the university's message to communities as distant as Australia and Japan, combining business trips with what amounted to an unofficial ambassadorship for the university.

"While our main direction will always remain fundraising on behalf of the university, this year's academic and social events have really been to raise the awareness of the Canadian community [regarding] what Canada has done on behalf of the Hebrew University," said Yoel Nesson, national executive director of the Canadian organization.

Canadian support for the university dates back to 1925, when the Menorah Society at the University of Manitoba helped sponsor a trip for Professor Guthrie Perry and Max Steinkopf to attend the opening of the Hebrew University on Mount Scopus. The two men subsequently reported on their visit at well-attended meetings held at the large Central Congregational Church.

"You can't walk down the hallways of the Hebrew University without seeing Canadian names," noted Nesson. "The Canadian presence is very pronounced."

Among those names is the Halbert Centre for Canadian Studies, co-sponsored by Ralph and Roz Halbert of Toronto along with the government of Canada. Canada Hall, a building on the Givat Ram campus, was one of a number of Hebrew University projects of Hadassah-WIZO of Canada.

UJA set to involve rabbis

TORONTO — United Jewish Appeal will be involving Toronto rabbis from all denominations in next year's campaign.

Orthodox, Conservative and Reform religious leaders will help plan and execute the annual fundraising effort.

It is the first time a Canadian UJA has created an all-encompassing partnership with the rabbinic community. Campaign '95 co-chair Wendy Eisen called the integration of rabbis "an innovative concept for Toronto.

"We want to strengthen the 'Jewish' in United Jewish Appeal," she said.

UJA campaign director Mark Gryfe hopes to create a Judaic component in a "non-threatening, non-intrusive fashion." He would like campaign cabinets to recognize rabbis as their "scholars in residence."

Beth Tzedec Congregation's Conservative Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl is enthusiastic about teaching campaign volunteers, "[being] not just a speech writer."

Beth Tikvah's Rabbi Wayne Allen, also Conservative, expects he and his colleagues will provide a Jewish perspective on treating others with respect and dignity. Participating rabbis are getting to know their UJA co-workers. Some, like Rabbi Mark Dratch from the Orthodox Shaarei Shomayim synagogue; Rabbi Moshe Stern, who heads the Orthodox Vaad Harabanim; Rabbi Dow Marmur from Holy Blossom Temple; and Rabbi Philip Scheim of the Conservative Beth David Synagogue, have formed an organizing committee.

Heimish exhibit reveals Canada's rich Yiddish past

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A love letter from his father in Canada to his mother in Europe dated 1928 and outlining arrangements for their marriage as soon as she steps off the boat is one of the prize possessions of Rabbi Edward Goldfarb of Shaarei Beth El Congregation in Oakville.

It is one of a fascinating array of items on view in One Hundred Years of Yiddish Canada until March 31 at the Beth Tzedec Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum.

This is a heimish exhibit, giving due recognition to events in the lives of ordinary Jews as well as to a historical overview of how Yiddish came to Canada.

On display is a naturalization certificate of a Mr. Warshafsky, a plate reserved for meat dishes on the White Star liner which brought many Jews to Canada, a Yiddish typewriter belonging to Yiddish poet Moshe Shaffir, and a Yiddish version of Snakes and Ladders.

"We wanted to give the exhibit an authentic local flavor," said curator Dorion Liebgott. One display case reveals the items found in a Jewish kitchen, a rebeizen (grater) vying for attention with a plaster mock-up of a carp about to go under the knife.

Magnificent photos, some of them never on public view before, of life in Poland at the turn of the century, are given a place of honor.

A series of pictures give an absolutely rivetting picture of life in Stazcov before World War I. They show among other things a blind beggar, musicians, water carriers, yeshivah bochers and a bearded rav. The pictures, taken by his father, were loaned by Simcha Rotenberg of Toronto.

The rich life of the shtetl is captured as well in vibrant photographs loaned by Philip and Laura Caplan and by Ruth Warren Hyman and her sisters.

A closely written account book in Yiddish, circa 1933, kept by merchant Isaac Selick of Hillsboro, New Brunswick, has a thumbprint on each page.

The rich contribution of Yiddish writers to the literature of Canada is not overlooked, the personal writing desk of Montreal poet J.I. Segal, and the original manuscripts of other writers, are displayed.

Early Toronto scenes include the Mandel Dairy on Baldwin Street, where a Yiddish sign still exists in the window, and the Rutherford Drug Store at Spadina and Nassau which later became Halperns and is now Wong's Pharmacy, a cultural transformation in miniature.

Wooden blocks of type belonging to Joseph Heller who is shown as he still lives today at his old printing shop on Spadina Avenue south of College Street are on display.

A large spittoon from the Kiever Synagogue in Kensington is above a sign translated into English reading: "Please, we ask you to sit down on a seat and not to walk around during service. Also, no smoking in the synagogue and no spitting on the floor."

McLeod favors Canada-Israel free trade

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — Ontario Liberal leader Lyn McLeod called for a free trade agreement between Canada and Israel during her first visit to the Jewish state last week.

"The advantages of a trade agreement between our countries are obvious," said McLeod, addressing the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce in Tel Aviv. The Liberal leader said that without such an agreement both countries are at a trading disadvantage.

"In order to qualify for duty-free treatment into Israel, Canadian companies must first send goods to the United States, adding 40 per cent of the product's value. As long as the U.S. has a trade agreement with Israel and Canada doesn't, value added in the United States is value lost to Canada," she said.

McLeod said she was confident that the issue of free trade would be raised this week during Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's meeting with Prime Minister Jean Chretien.

Lyn McLeod

McLeod stopped short of calling for an end to Canada's restrictive policy on arms trade with Israel. "This is a federal matter which I would prefer not to comment on," she told The CJN.

The Canadian policy — now under review — prohibits sale or purchase of defense equipment to or from Israel, because the country is considered to be in "a region of conflict."

Israeli leaders, including Rabin, have sharply criticized the policy. Ontario Premier Bob Rae called for an end to the Canadian restrictions during his visit to Israel last year.

"I see trade opportunities between Ontario and Israel in construction, microelectronics, environmental technologies, and biotechnology," said McLeod. "Ontario building materials could find a good market in Israel, which is in the midst of a construction boom."

The Liberal leader said she also hoped an Ontario company might be involved in designing the subway system planned for Tel Aviv, and raised this possibility during her meeting with Tel Aviv Mayor Ronni Milo.

McLeod, who was on a private visit, was accompanied by Liberal MPPs Monte Kwinter (Wilson Heights) and Joseph Cordiano (Lawrence).

After touring the Golan Heights, the Liberal leader said she could "appreciate the strategic importance of the Golan to the security of Israel.

"I believe Canadian peacekeeping troops are prepared to continue playing a role in the region if an agreement is reached between Israel and Syria," she added.

McLeod said she was struck by the strong Canadian presence in Israel, citing the Canada Centre in the border town of Metulla.

"The mayor of Metulla told me that his dream is to turn the sounds of war into the sounds of children laughing. The Canada Centre has helped do that. It has changed the nature of life in that community, and constitutes an impressive Canadian contribution to the peace process."

During her visit, McLeod met with Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin, Deputy Trade Minister Masha Lubelsky, Members of Knesset, Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, as well as Milo.

She also laid a wreath at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial, met with Canadian students studying at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and visited an immigrant absorption centre. During a visit to the Gaza Strip, she met with the member of the Palestinian Authority responsible for justice, Freih Abu Meidan.

Israel stays on sidelines following Gaza riots

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — While Palestinian leaders attempted over the weekend to calm tensions in the wake of bloody rioting in the Gaza Strip last Friday that left 15 dead, Israeli officials offered restrained reactions, careful to avoid any appearance of interference.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said flatly that Israel would not intervene in what he described as a matter best left for the Palestinians to work out for themselves.

"I propose we leave it to the Palestinians to deal with their internal matters," he told Army Radio from the United States, where he was on an official visit, as well as to address the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations in Denver.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres echoed that view. "The current struggle between the (PLO) and Hamas and the Islamic Jihad is an internal Palestinian issue," he told Army Radio. "We must be very cautious and not create the impression that Israel is involved."

Peres instead stressed the economic problems facing Gaza, noting that pledges of financial support from foreign donor nations have failed to materialize. As a result, he said, the Palestinian leadership has been hampered in its attempts to improve the lot of the average Gazan.

At its weekly meeting Sunday, the cabinet was briefed on last Friday's violence in Gaza, the worst outbreak of Palestinian infighting since the start of self-rule in May.

The street battles, which left 15 Palestinians dead and injured some 250, was sparked by clashes between the Palestinian police and followers of rejectionist fundamentalist movements who had gathered outside Gaza City's main mosque. Each side has blamed the other for starting the fighting.

The cabinet on Sunday was also briefed by the Israel Defence Force Chief of Staff, Lt.-Gen. Ehud Barak, about a Saturday night terrorist attack near the Israeli settlement of Netzarim in Gaza, where an Israeli soldier was killed — the fourth in less than two weeks at the site.

Barak told ministers about a demonstration by some 300 Hamas supporters who overtook an Army checkpoint near Netzarim and raised a Palestinian flag after destroying the post.

Following standing orders, the soldiers fled the checkpoint under a hail of stones thrown by the demonstrators.

Staff-Sgt. Gil Sadon, 26, of Tel Aviv, was later killed at the site, when a speeding car with Gaza license plates opened fire on the Army post. It was the same post where, on Nov. 11, a terrorist rode up on a bicycle and exploded a bomb that claimed the lives of three other Israeli soldiers.

Sadon was buried in Tel Aviv on Sunday.

Barak criticized the Palestinian police for not doing enough to prevent the rioting at the post, but Economics Minister Shimon Shetreet said ensuring the safety of Israeli civilians in Gaza was not the Palestinians' responsibility.

Peres and Environment Minister Yossi Sarid expressed support for the IDF's decision to order the soldiers to abandon their post temporarily. Peres, who is acting prime minister while Rabin is in the United States, said the evacuation prevented large-scale bloodshed.

The Likud party caucus in the Knesset, meanwhile, said that responsibility for the events at the Netzarim Army post lies with the Israeli government.

Moshe Katsav, Likud caucus chairman, said that further implementation of the self-rule accord should be suspended until PLO leader Yasser Arafat got full control of the situation in Gaza.

The leader of the right-wing Tsomet Party, Rafael Eitan, called the standing IDF orders that required soldiers to flee the outpost at Netzarim an "incomparable disgrace."

Arafat, who held meetings with his aides in Gaza over the weekend to discuss the situation in the wake of the rioting, later announced that he would appoint an official committee to look into the causes of the violence.

Jewish women to lobby at UN conference

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Hundreds of Jewish women from around the world convened in Jerusalem earlier this month for a conference to discuss the status of women and plan strategies for next year's United Nations Conference on Women, to be held in Beijing.

Representatives from 26 countries, including Canada, the United States, Australia, Hong Kong and Eastern Europe attended workshops and shared insights. But their primary goal was to lay the foundations for a strong Jewish lobby at the Beijing conference next September.

Representing Canada were Toronto's Helen Marr, president of the International Council of Jewish Women (ICJW); Sharon Wolchok, president of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada; Miriam Ferstman of the ICJW; and Liberal MP from Windsor Shaughnessy Cohen.

At previous UN world conferences on women, delegates from countries hostile to Israel have initiated anti-Zionist resolutions or walked out during speeches by Israeli delegates.

At the 1975 conference in Mexico, a resolution was brought forward equating Zionism with racism.

"What we asked (of the participants) is that whoever will be able to represent the Jewish attitude or opinion be prepared for any manifestation of anti-Israel or anti-Semitic attacks," said Dr. Mina Westman, chair of the Council of Women's Organizations in Israel.

Westman, who will serve in the official Israeli delegation to Beijing, believed that the attitudes of Arab and Muslim participants toward the Israeli and Jewish delegates may not have changed much, despite the ongoing Middle East peace process.

She said a Foreign Ministry official had informed the conference in Jerusalem that Jordanian delegates were considering an anti-Israel resolution.

But she was nonetheless hopeful there would be a change of attitude at the Beijing conference.

"Definitely the atmosphere is better. And who knows, we've got 10 months to go," she said.

The Jerusalem conference also gave delegates a chance to compare notes on the status of women in each other's countries.

A number of resolutions were adopted at the conclusion of the conference. They included welcoming the peace process and urging the inclusion of women in all levels of peace negotiations; demanding that governments implement and fund policies to combat violence against women; and calling on men and women alike to create a mutual commitment to work against discrimination.

PLO, Hamas to blame Israel for riots

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JEUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority (PA) and Islamic fundamentalists will both try to blame Israel for last Friday's rioting and shooting in the Gaza Strip, to avoid revenge attacks against each other, Israeli Arabs mediating between the two sides say.

The two sides have not yet agreed on who should head an inquiry committee to determine what happened last Friday in Gaza City, where 15 Palestinians were killed and over 200 wounded in street battles, said Hamas activists who participated in meetings with the mediators.

The bloody clash between Palestinian police and Islamic activists in Gaza spilled over into riots against Israeli troops on Saturday, with demonstrations across the Gaza Strip.

The clashes with Israeli troops left three Palestinians dead and nine wounded.

Preventive Security police in Gaza said they had arrested some 20 suspected collaborators with Israel in connection with Friday's violence, Palestinian sources reported.

Gaza police, who released several Islamic Jihad members on Sunday, would not confirm the arrests, but said collaborators were suspected of involvement.

The PA and the fundamentalists have agreed that a committee headed by Gaza lawyer Fayez Abu Rahme will decide on steps to restore peace and public order. But there has been no agreement on who should head a judicial inquiry committee to examine the riot itself.

In the mediated talks between Hamas and Arafat, each side was adamant that it did not start the riot, so any inquiry that assigns blame to one side or the other is likely to be rejected.

Deputy Agriculture Minister Walid Sadek, a member of the Israeli-Arab mediation team, said after meeting with Hamas spokesman Dr. Mahmud Zahar that "there is a sharp dispute over who was responsible. Hamas wants Arafat to bend towards it and says collaborators [with Israel] are to blame."

A Hamas supporter attending the meeting with the mediators said the Islamic fundamentalists believe "the Israelis are responsible because they always put the Palestinian Authority under pressure."

He said there are no direct talks now with Arafat because Hamas feels it is more important to restore calm in the streets.

"What is important now is to see what happens in the streets. The feeling of all the people is that the police attacked people at prayer," the supporter said.

At a Hamas memorial meeting on Sunday, one young speaker said, "The Palestinian police did what the Jews never did."

Diverting blame toward Israel would serve the immediate political interests of the Islamic and PLO leadership without contradicting eyewitness accounts of the rioting. The police claim that shots were fired at them, and Hamas claims its people did not carry guns.

Sadek said the Israeli Arab team is trying to find a different formula for assigning responsibility that would satisfy both sides without blaming Israel. "We don't have one yet, but with the help of the richness of the Arabic language, we'll find a way."

Rabin slams Golan Heights lobbyists

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

DENVER — Shortly before his visit this week to Washington, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin attacked lobbying efforts under way on Capitol Hill by Israelis opposed to any withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

"They are causing long-term damage to the State of Israel," Rabin said, referring to Israelis rallying American opinion against the possible deployment of U.S. troops on the Golan Heights in the event of an Israeli-Syrian peace accord.

Rabin made those remarks last week at a news conference following his address to the General Assembly (GA) of the Council of Jewish Federations here Nov. 17.

In English-language remarks to reporters, Rabin took a low-key position against the lobbying effort, pointing to the 1,000 American soldiers already stationed in the Sinai as part of a multinational force observing compliance with the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty.

Those soldiers do not constitute "a peacekeeping force like in Somalia or Sarajevo," he said.

But responding in Hebrew to an Israeli journalist, the prime minister lashed out at the ongoing efforts on Capitol Hill as encouraging American isolationism.

"Imagine if that atmosphere prevailed during the Gulf War," he said. "The face of the Middle East would be different from end to end."

A United States unwilling to do on the Golan what it has been doing in the Sinai for 15 years "will be a different America with negative implications for the future of the Middle East."

Rabin also spoke out against the lobbying effort in private remarks to major donors to the United Jewish Appeal.

His remarks came against the backdrop of a new, potentially more hostile environment in Washington that is taking shape as Republicans start to spell out their agenda for the incoming Congress that they will dominate.

Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.), the powerful conservative who is slated to chair the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, told the CNN program Evans and Novak on Saturday that he is opposed to sending American troops to the Golan.

He criticized the whole effort at peace between Israel and Syria. "This whole peace process over there is a fraud," Helms said. "Syria doesn't want peace. They want the Golan Heights. They want access to the pocketbooks of the American taxpayers."

At the GA, Likud party leader Benjamin Netanyahu dissociated himself from the current lobbying efforts in Washington.

Addressing the CJF meeting the day after Rabin, Netanyahu said that lobbying on Israeli issues should take place in the Knesset, not on Capitol Hill.

And in subsequent remarks to journalists, he said that the Israelis spearheading the effort in Washington "are not members of the Likud."

"If I wanted to launch a lobbying effort on the Golan," Netanyahu said, "I would have plenty of excellent talent. But I don't want to do so."

Reconstructionist movement at a crossroads after 40 years

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

DANA POINT, Calif. — Forty years after five Reconstructionist Jews had their first organized meeting, and 20 years after the first rabbis were ordained by the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College, the movement is at a crossroads.

Reconstructionism — what it is and how it is different from Judaism's other liberal movements — is often not clear to its own members, as well as to the rest of the Jewish world.

The confusion was the source of many jokes and of the theme for the recent conference of the Federation of Reconstructionist Congregations and Havurot, the movement's congregational arm, held at the Dana Point Resort here Nov. 10-13.

Canadians were represented in the persons of Rabbi Lawrence Pinsker of Toronto's Congregation Darchei Noam; Rabbi Ron Aigen of Dorshei Emet Congregation in Montreal and members of the Ottawa chavura, which claims 100 families.

Edna Edelberg of Toronto was named vice-president for Canada of the Reconstructionist movement.

Titled "Spirit, Intellect, Community: The Reconstructionist Search," the conference, which attracted about 300 people, centered on defining the Reconstructionist integration of those three pillars of Jewish life.

It began with roundtable discussions on explaining and understanding the movement.

Part of the confusion stems from the fact that "people like soundbites and easy answers, but Reconstructionism is not about that. It's about taking your own practice and belief system seriously," said Rabbi Mordechai Liebling, executive vice president of the federation.

Members often come to Reconstructionist congregations with little idea of what Reconstructionism is, said conference participants.

The movement now has 78 affiliates, more than triple the number of member congregations it had in 1980, and many of the congregations have themselves enjoyed explosive growth in membership.

That growth brings with it administrative and some financial problems for Reconstructionist organizations, which are still structured to serve a tiny movement.

It also brings with it philosophical and educational challenges for a movement that has been intimate, and now must make the transition to the different dynamic of a larger organization.

Most members of Judaism's youngest movement have backgrounds in other movements, or come from no synagogue affiliation at all, according to the movement's members.

And those things which have set Reconstructionism apart from Judaism's other movements — an emphasis on study, openness and creativity in liturgy and ritual, the ordination of women and acceptance of gay and lesbian Jews — have become less defining as many non-Reconstructionist liberal congregations integrate similar approaches.

What's more, new members are often Jewishly uneducated, according to Jane Susswein, newly installed president of the federation.

Reconstructionist theology and philosophy, as articulated by founder Rabbi Mordechai Kaplan and his followers, is profoundly different from Judaism's other movements. In practice, Reconstructionist Jews are often as observant, or even more observant, than Conservative Jews — but for different reasons.

Reconstructionists see Torah not as a divinely inspired or even historically accurate document, but as a collection of myths reflecting the spiritual experience and searching of the Jewish people.

Reconstructionists' decisions about issues ranging from the kashrut policy of a synagogue to whether same-sex unions may be religiously sanctified are made after studying Jewish sources. The decisions are informed — but not dictated — by tradition.

Torah "has a vote but not a veto," according to Kaplan's theology.

That plays out as "eat kosher but think treif," according to Rabbi Arnold Rachlis, spiritual leader of University Synagogue in Irvine, Calif., who led a workshop on spirituality.

It means "be a traditional Jew when it doesn't conflict with ethics, like on the women's issue, and to think to the very fullest limits," Rabbi Rachlis said.

The Reconstructionist movement tries to negotiate a unique path between the individual autonomy at the heart of Reform Judaism and the obedience to Jewish law espoused by Conservative Judaism, if not Conservative Jews.

In Reconstructionism, community has primacy.

Kaplan espoused "belonging" as the vehicle for Jewish participation, rather than behaving or believing. This stands as a stark contrast with traditional Judaism, which focuses first on behavior, or the performance of mitzvot, then belief, and finally, membership, as the measures of Jewish commitment.

Adding another twist to the picture is a statement by the BJC board that it will resign on Nov. 30, when its mandate lapses. The interim board was appointed by Richter & Partners pending a final restructuring of the JCC into three distinct corporate entities – the BJC, the Bloor JCC and the Valley JCC.

Although re-opening the theatre and compensating the unsecured creditors has been the subject of recent negotiations, sources told The CJN that proposals to rescue the JCC might still go awry.

"If there's a successful resolution of the problem, it will probably be on the basis that third party creditors will be paid in full. But that will depend on the rescue attempt succeeding," said Lorie Waisberg, lawyer for the Federation. "Reopening the theatre is one of the issues on the table."

BJC spokesman Howard English said the BJC views plans for an independent theatre as "a recipe for confusion and financial problems."

As to the compensation for unsecured creditors, Waisberg said "it's fair to say the Federation hasn't changed its position that it doesn't have the financial resources to pay all these [creditors]. There are people in the community with financial resources."

The parties are also discussing ways to replenish the $2.4-million endowment fund established by Posluns to support the theatre, said Robert Harlang, Richter's representative on JCC matters.

Harlang said the latest round of talks took place after Richter & Partners filed court documents several weeks ago requesting authorization to sell two of the JCC's properties, its Bloor and Bathurst branches. (A members' group at the Bloor JCC will take control of that facility while a new corporation will run the Bathurst facility.)

Posluns appeared in court raising concerns over the disposition of the endowment fund. Ontario Court Justice John Farley suggested that Posluns, the Federation and Richter attempt to resolve their differences, Harlang said.

"Several meetings (followed) and a tentative agreement was in place, but there are differences of opinion over the actual (implementation)," he said. "It involves a difference of opinion over how the $2.4-million endowment fund would be replenished. They were trying to settle on a way to raise the funds."

Harlang said termination and compensation packages for ex-employees would be calculated according to formulas set out in the Employment Standards Act.

Altogether, about $2 million is owing to unsecured creditors, such as ex-employees and tradesmen, and to Revenue Canada for unremitted payroll deductions, he said.

Separate arrangements are being discussed with secured creditors like the Bank of Montreal and Honeywell. The bank is owed $9.1 million in principal and $900,000 in interest and other charges.

Proposals forwarded to the bank would see it paid $9.1 million over several years. The bank has not received any payment of either principal or interest since the summer of 1993, Harlang said.

Although negotiations over the BJC's future have been ongoing, no one from the BJC has taken part in those meetings, English said. In a statement issued by the BJC, the board stated the BJC can be a viable institution if it gets "complete control over all the programs and all the property at 4588 Bathurst St. The theatre building and related programs are integral components of the BJC.

"The board supports the use of the theatre building by communal groups, outside parties and theatrical productions, as long as overall authority rests with the BJC."

Meanwhile, the former JCC branches continue to take steps towards institutional autonomy. Approximately 3,500 members took the BJC up on its offer to re-register before a Nov. 1 deadline, English said. That is about half the regular athletic or program members at the Bathurst branch of the JCC.

English said the BJC is satisfied with those numbers since the reregistration program lasted only a few weeks and many health club members have left the country for the winter.

The Bloor JCC, which is currently being operated by an independent management company, has seen its children's programs " filled to capacity. The place is alive with programming activities," said centre spokesman Mark Sarner. "There's no question that the restructuring has had a big impact in attracting families and children."

The Bloor JCC is honoring all JCC "yerushas" (lifetime memberships), subject to an annual $200 fee, and will honor unexpired JCC cards, Sarner said.

Obus Forme targets millions of back pain sufferers

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — What do Joan Rivers, Cito Gaston, Pierre Trudeau, Jackie Mason, and Isaac Stern all have in common? They have all experienced backaches, and they each own an Obus Forme.

Perhaps the most widely recognized trade name in orthopedic equipment, Obus Forme (from the French for shell-shaped) is now the standard back rest/support. It has provided relief for millions of chronic back pain sufferers.

Obus Forme was developed by a Torontonian, Frank Roberts, 63, who runs the company with his youngest son, Brian, 34. The two have received many awards for design and entrepreneurship.

In their factory on Hopewell Avenue, all Obus Formes are assembled, packaged, cut and sewn together for markets around the globe.

"We are still a young, dynamic company," says Frank. "Although the Obus Forme is now available in 26 countries ... we are really only starting to grow."

Demand has remained undiminished since Frank invented his first prototype 15 years ago — literally by accident.

He sustained a back injury playing tennis and was almost incapacitated. During many months lying in traction, he researched the causes and cures for back pain. He discovered that surgery was the common treatment for chronic pain, but that even repeated operations did not always relieve back pain.

When his own condition did not improve, he cut his body cast in half, covered it with foam and a pillowcase and used it while sitting. The pain gradually subsided.

Since then, the Obus Forme has undergone some changes and enhancements as materials and technology improved. The shape was altered after consultations with orthopedic surgeons. But the basic look has remained essentially true to the original.

The Roberts attribute their success in the family-run enterprise to "Plain old hard work," with 16-hour days not uncommon.

They meet with their distributors worldwide and visit as many retail accounts as possible.

The Roberts are about to embark upon an aggressive advertising campaign for Obus Forme to take the American market by storm. Their long-term goal is to distribute the back rest line, endorsed by the Canadian and American chiropractic associations, in every country of the world.

The moral behind the Obus Forme story: Hard work, commitment and dedication to marketing a product that truly helps people, need not be a pain in the back.

Israel: a land of investment

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When questioned about a possible new mutual fund, Allan Feld, vice-president of Israel's Evergreen Capital Markets Ltd., carefully frames his answer.

"We are exploring the opportunity to see how Canadians can participate in our money management services," Feld says.

Feld has nothing but good news to report about Israel's economic climate to potential investors. He was on his first visit back to Toronto since making aliyah five months ago.

Evergreen Capital Markets is a subsidiary of Evergreen Canada-Israel Investment Ltd., a firm founded by Jacob Burak in 1987. Beginning with $3 million (US), the parent company now boasts $120 million (US) — a 25 per cent annual return for the original investors.

Today, Israel is looking more and more like a land of opportunity. Domestic and foreign investors, as well as firms like Evergreen who are getting in on the bottom floor, stand to make a fortune.

Evergreen Capital Markets is a full service investment bank that specializes in corporate finance and money management.

Feld says Evergreen has the led the way in private placements — finding investors prior to a firm going public — for Israeli companies. In fact, in the last two years, Evergreen has done close to $50 million (US) in business.

"We are bringing North American standards to raising money in Israel," he says.

Five months ago Evergreen introduced what Feld calls the firm's strategic alliance area. Essentially, it matches Israeli firms and products — frequently founded, made and designed by Soviet olim — with established Canadian companies.

Feld says that while Israel's entrepreneurs are R&D experts, most lack the business experience needed to market and export a product.

"Right now, no one is focusing on establishing relations between Canada and Israel on a professional basis," Feld says. Evergreen is not limiting itself to the Canadian market.

The vast majority of the parent firm's initial investors were Canadian, hence the name Evergreen.

Feld points out that strategic alliances between the countries make sense from a statistical standpoint. Based on 1993 figures, Israel spent three per cent of its GDP on R&D; Canada spent 1.4 per cent. "The gap is enormous," he says.

Money management, the firm's $38-million second area of expertise, holds three mutual funds for Israel's institutional investors and some portfolios.

Citing a variety of reasons, Feld notes that the 40 per cent drop in this area since the beginning of the year means investors will find Israel's market relatively cheap.

Feld predicts the best buys will be found on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (TASE). Some Israeli companies are listed in New York (mostly hi-tech firms) and some on the TASE (some hi-tech and everything else).

He says the peace process process will continue to entice monetary investments and tourists to Israel; and immigration is predicted to continue at a rate of 70,000 to 80,000 per year. As a result, basic necessity, infrastructure and tourism stocks will soar.

Through all this good news, Feld says potential investors will need the services of investment firms who, like Evergreen, know the Israeli money markets.

Feld cautions people on investing directly since company research reports are not available in Israel.

Ehud Amir, a former manager of investment for Menorah Insurance Company, Israel's fourth largest insurance firm, has recently joined Evergreen. Amir has put together a team of six people responsible for detailed analyses of companies.

Evergreen's North American services in Israel should entice Canadian investors to mutual fund investment, but Canada's own market is seeing recent substantial setbacks.

In the Nov. 17 issue of The Financial Post, it was reported that mutual fund redemptions outpaced new sales again in October as investors poured almost $1 billion net into Canada Savings Bonds, guaranteed income certificates and other shorter-term investments.

Feld replies, "Canadians are moving money out of mutuals because they don't like the returns in North America. We are seeing more interest in emerging markets and Canadians will become interested in the Israel.

"Israel offers the growth of an emerging market but like any other developed country, Israel has R&D expenditure, exports per capita and GDP per capita. These are all good indications of a developing country."

Bond Executive Offices helps lower start-up costs

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Andrea Bricks and Eva Stal set up their real estate company, Palomine Properties Ltd., they minimized their start-up costs by renting space in an executive office suite and sharing a receptionist and other services with several independent businesses.

Bricks and Stal told The CJN they weren't happy with the space — it was so shabby they had to take their clients to restaurants — and began looking for another executive suite. When they couldn't find one that met their standards they started their own, Bond Executive Offices Inc.

Bond, located at 1370 Don Mills Rd., just north of Lawrence Avenue, opened in 1990. Stal and Bricks took over the third floor of a new building and converted the 12,000-plus sq.ft. space into a facility to meet the needs of independent businesses.

The space was divided into 39 offices, two meeting rooms, a conference room with audio-visual facilities, two kitchens, a mini-gym with exercise equipment and a shower, and a large reception area.

The women also set up flexible leases or service agreements, which they said were better suited to fledgling businesses. Space at Bond can be leased yearly, monthly, part time — even hours. Suites, furnished or unfurnished, range in size from 130 to 300 square feet. The executive office package starts at $500 per month of full-time use and includes mail, phone and fax services.

The company also offers a package with personalized answering and paging service as well as an office mailing address.

Stal and Bricks rented executive suites for five years before they established Bond so they knew what they wanted, Bricks said. "We knew what was wrong. We took the wrongs and tried to make it right."

Bond includes many complimentary services such as coffee, "unlimited, reasonable use" of the boardroom or meeting room, free parking, and use of a hi-tech telephone in the service agreement, because Stal and Bricks said they resented being charged for every little thing when they were in the first office.

> 'Everyone wanted to nickel and dime me'

Hugh Ritchie, a tenant at Bond, said the complimentary services swayed him in favor of setting up the Canadian branch of A.V. Qualite, an international engineering firm, at Bond. "Everybody else wanted to nickel and dime me," he said.

Norman Lowe, a tenant at Bond for four years, sold his Bay Street advertising firm and has been working as independent consultant in marketing and communications. He said working out of Bond saves him a lot of money. "[Bond] gives you a first class image at a fraction of the price," he said.

Marcia Cardamore runs an employment consulting firm with four employees out of Bond. She told The CJN she set up her office there because she did not want to be bogged down with running an office; she wanted to focus her attention on her business.

Stal and Bricks also wanted to concentrate on running their Palomine business. They initially hired a manager to run Bond, but the suites did not take off in the first year. It was the start of the recession, Bricks said. "We were not bombarded with inquiries. We had to go after the business."

They replaced the first manager with her cousin, Shari Bricks-Young, and the business soon turned around. Both Stal and Bricks have become more active in running the company.

Today Bond has 70 clients and a 90 per cent occupancy rate. The company has been so successful that several commercial building owners have approached the three women about setting up in other locations.

With the trend in downsizing, many people are starting their own businesses and are in need of executive suites, Bricks said, adding that technological advances are making it possible for companies like Bond to offer an increasing array of services.

"We see this business has wonderful potential," she said. "We're going into a new era of communications and high technology in the business world and we want to be at the front of the line."

Kleinstein Glazer recognized for business achievement

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

NORTH YORK — Edie Kleinstein Glazer, vice-president of Greater Gulf Properties, is the North York Chamber of Commerce (NYCC) Woman of the Year.

During the NYCC annual Business Excellence Awards Dinner at the Prince Hotel, Glazer accepted an etched crystal plaque in recognition of her achievement.

Glazer attended York Mills Collegiate and graduated from York University. Greater Gulf Properties, which was founded by her father, Joseph Kleinstein, has been based in North York for the past 20 years.

Glazer juggles family, corporate and community commitments with caring, competence and enthusiasm.

She keeps in close touch with her daughter Romi, a student at the University of Western Ontario, and she is always open to discussing the concerns of Elise, who goes to York Mills Collegiate.

In association with her husband Mike and brother Art Kleinstein (it's a family business) Glazer has built Greater Gulf into a successful property development and management company.

As office administrator, marketing and design consultant, she is alert to needs within the company and in the field, and helps meet the challenge of today's fickle economy with a resourcefulness and staying power which keep her firm viable and profitable.

And she gives full measure to the community. In keeping with her own work ethic, she appreciates the prime goal of ORT, the Organization for Educational Research and Technology, which funds schools in 60 countries, all devoted to teaching students self-sufficiency.

She is currently national president of Women's Canadian ORT which, she affirms, provides relevant education for the 21st century.

"I've been lucky," she says. "I want to give something back!"

Friendly face greeted immigrants

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When people think of immigrants to America, they conjure up Ellis Island, the Statue of Liberty and families anxious to be a part of the "goldene medina."

Immigrants to Canada, however, likely remember Halifax's Pier 21, used to absorb over a million new Canadians from 1928 to 1971.

Among those who came through Pier 21 were thousands of Jews, including survivors from Poland, Russia, Germany and other countries ravaged by Hitler's terror.

As well, Pier 21 was a temporary home and meeting place for servicemen and women during World War II.

For decades, Jewish immigrants and military personnel were greeted by a Halifax volunteer, Sadie Fineberg.

Fineberg's children, Elliot and Leonard, and Helen Freedman, now a Toronto resident, remember their mother's dedication to Pier 21, first as a volunteer for Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) and later as an unpaid official representative of the City of Halifax.

Elliot Fineberg remembers going with his father, the late philanthropist and businessman Morris Fineberg, "to drag her home at all hours of the night.

"Many a time," he remembers, "there would be a Jewish family stranded there. Maybe they had to wait to take a train the next day. Anyway, my mother would call home and tell us to bring down salami and rye bread for them to eat."

Sometimes, the children remember, people would stay in their home overnight, or for several nights, waiting for trains, their papers, or for health problems.

"Our house was like a hotel," Elliot recalls, remembering stays by Canadian chess champion Abe Yanofsky, then in the navy, and not-yet-famous comedians Johnny Wayne and Frank Shuster.

During the war, Sadie Fineberg, partly through her beloved B'nai Brith chapter, prepared food for the soldiers. Daughter Helen says she also worked with convalescing soldiers and veterans at Camp Hill Hospital.

A 1954 issue of Chatelaine describes her as good-humored, well-spoken and full of energy, with a pocket bulging with facial tissue ("to wipe the kids' noses") and a loaf of garlic bread "in case they're hungry," she explained.

Today's liberated women often denigrate the volunteer work done by their mothers and grandmothers. But read this tribute to her by Halifax Mail-Star columnist Peter Duffy, himself an immigrant, although not through Pier 21.

"I kind of wish she'd been around when I came ashore. Not for the tissues or the bread, but a friendly face would've meant a lot to someone alone like me."

Or this excerpt from a letter from an immigrant in 1964, thanking her for her "kind and gentle help and guidance ... how lucky we were having you around in a strange place, helping us with all the formalities of new arrivals in our new country."

Pier 21 is closed now, but not forgotten. The Pier 21 society is trying to preserve it "not only as a memorial to trans-Atlantic immigration, but also as a focus for the celebration of multiculturalism."

For more information about the society, write PO Box 2024, Station M, 1869 Upper Water St., Halifax, B3J 2Z1.

Travel Talk

By Bill Gladstone

Ukraine is a beautiful country filled with astonishingly friendly people, but if you intend to travel there by car, be sure to take along a canister of gasoline in the trunk as well as someone who can repair the engine in case it needs servicing.

There are no service areas and almost no toilet facilities, highway signs, car repair facilities, telephones or supermarkets along the roads in most of Ukraine, according to Miriam Weiner, the New Jersey-based professional genealogist who goes there three or four times a year, for six to eight weeks at a time.

"If you're going there to experience a place where your ancestors lived, you're going to get more of your ancestor's experience than you bargained for," she says. "Many places look just like they did 100 years ago, with horses and wagons on the streets and people taking water from the well."

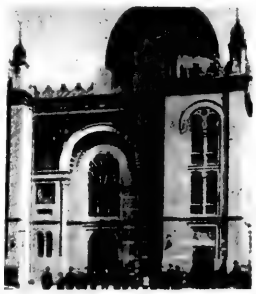
With an uncertain political situation, rampant inflation, a growing crime rate, and regular shortages of consumer goods and some foods, present-day Ukraine may not seem the best spot for a relaxing two-week vacation. North American travellers invariably report that the country, with its poorly developed infrastructure, is not entirely amenable to tourists.

Hotels, for example, are often unable to supply hot water, there are no air conditioners to relieve the sweltering heat of summer, and it is difficult or impossible to find replacement eyeglasses, medical prescriptions or even camera batteries.

Nonetheless, "some areas are extremely picturesque," says Weiner. "I particularly like western Ukraine. The best times to be there are May and June or September and October, when the leaves turn color."

Three years ago, a wealthy North American businessman paid Weiner to visit his ancestral town in Moldova and research his family tree. Following the successful completion of that mission, she received so many similar requests that she has purchased her own apartment in Mogilev Podolsky. Situated on the border between Ukraine and Moldova, the town is central to Lviv, Odessa, Kiev and Kishinev, all cities that once possessed thriving Jewish communities.

The only Jewish genealogist to travel to Ukraine, Moldova, Poland and Belarus on a regular basis, Weiner used to offer "Routes to Roots" group tours. Two years ago, she took a group of American Jewish genealogists on an unprecedented hands-on research trip through several Ukrainian archives, an event that was amply covered on Ukrainian television.



The great synagogue of Chernovtsy in the Ukraine was destroyed during the Holocaust

On that trip, involving 28 researchers, Weiner arranged eight separate cars, drivers and translators so group members could travel from Lviv in eight separate directions. However, she says she felt uncomfortable being unable to accompany all of them at once — "I couldn't take care of them all myself" is how she puts it — so she decided to retire from the group tour business.

Now the well-known co-author of the Encyclopedia of Jewish Genealogy conducts visits to ancestral shtetlach on behalf of dozens of clients each year, bringing back archival family documents (sometimes by the hundreds), maps showing the locations of family homesteads and various Jewish sites, a self-produced video showing the town and some of its remaining Jews, a photo album filled with snapshots and postcards, and other assorted souvenirs. In some cases, she has also brought back names and photographs of her clients' previously unknown relatives.

Currently compiling a trio of pioneering reference books listing Jewish materials available in archives in Poland, Ukraine, Moldova, Belarus and Lithuania, Weiner says she continues to be surprised at the amount of material which has survived the Holocaust and has been inaccessible for so many years to the Western world.

For information on a particular shtetl or on Miriam Weiner's research services in general, write to her at 136 Sandpiper Key, Secaucus, N.J. 07094.

The rockin' tunes of The Watchmen

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Readers place your hands on your buzzers and get ready for this week's edition of Reach for the Top.

What do the Guess Who, Bachman-Turner Overdrive, the Crash Test Dummies and the Watchmen all have in common?

Time's up. If you guessed they're all bands who hail from Winnipeg, give yourself 15 points and a crack at the bonus round.

For an additional 15 points, which of the bands are currently on a cross-Canada tour in support of a record that has sold more than 50,000 copies domestically?

If you answered, the Watchmen, pat yourselves on the back and credit yourselves for being up on the ever-changing world of pop music.

The Watchmen — Joey Serlin, Danny Greaves, Sammy Kohn and Ken Tizzard — do not quite yet fit in the pantheon of Canadian rock legends as do their prairie predecessors, but the group is making a name for itself as a hard-working, straight-ahead rock band that dishes up its music with some of the rough edges left on.

Sounding a little like a collision between 54-40 and the Tragically Hip, the band was in Toronto recently to play the Phoenix during their latest cross-Canada tour. They've been on the road since June and have played practically every town and truck stop of note since then.

In late February, they plan to tour Europe.

"In order to maintain our longevity, we have to start spreading the word geographically," said Serlin, 24, the band's guitarist. "We want to test the waters in other countries and develop new fans. We're pretty realistic. We want to make a living doing what we love. It's a pretty sweet deal, being your own boss."

If Serlin sounds more level-headed than your average rocker, he is. Unlike some of their more notorious rock counterparts, the Watchmen have yet to trash any hotel rooms or spark any concert riots.

As Greaves, the band's vocalist, points out, "I wouldn't want to throw a TV out of a window. I'd rather put it in the jeep."

Although they first started playing together in their university days, Serlin, Kohn and Greaves have known each other since kindergarten. Tizzard joined the group recently after the previous bass player left the band.

Serlin, Kohn, 24, and Greaves, 23, attended Ramah elementary school in Winnipeg's south end. They all had stints playing and singing in Chai, the city's Jewish folklore ensemble.

So how does the lilting Erev Shel Shoshanim change into the jarring Boneyard Tree? "Music is music," Serlin explains. "There are all kinds. I learned a lot in Chai, a lot of chords that aren't rock chords."

Kohn, who played in Chai for three years, said the Mideastern musical influence came to the surface in his percussion intro to the song Middle East, on their new gold record, In the Trees. The song, he explained, is named for a restaurant in Boston and is about a woman the band met there.

Kohn admits the intro is "knicked from a Chai song, Donkey Dopka. One summer at Folklorama (the equivalent to Toronto's Caravan) I must have played it 300 times. It's been ingrained into our minds."

With the future looking bright and with the Watchmen developing a fan base, the band expects to expand their musical horizons for their next album. People shouldn't pigeonhole the band as alternative or hard rock, Greaves explains. Fans might be treated to the band's mellower side in their next album.

Chanukah festivities can have an Israeli theme

By LESLIE MICHLIN BORDEN

Special to The CJN

Jewish people throughout the world remember the miracle of Chanukah by serving foods made with oil. Eastern European Jews make potato latkes, pancakes fried in oil. Sephardi Jews, especially those from North Africa, offer a variety of fried doughnut-like cakes. These cakes are called soufganiot in Israel.

For a change, organize one evening's festivities around a meal with an Israeli theme. Start with an appetizer platter of fresh vegetables and pita bread triangles for dipping into a bowl of hummus, pureed garbanzo beans seasoned with garlic, lemon juice and cumin.

For the entree, have your guests fill pita bread halves with spicy Middle Eastern meatballs. Top the meatballs with baba ghanoush, a mixture of cooked eggplant and hummus. Include an assortment of Israeli salads such as tabouli (a delightful combination of parsley, tomatoes and bulgar wheat), wilted cucumbers and a flavorful lentil dish garnished with mint and other tasty herbs as the accompanying side dishes.

For dessert, prepare the Israeli jelly doughnuts. Making them can be part of the party activities. Have each person shape and fill his or her own doughnut. Provide an assortment of jams and jellies for an authentic Israeli touch. Let the doughnuts rise while everyone eats dinner. Then fry and serve them hot.

HUMMUS

3 cloves garlic, peeled
1 tsp. salt, or to taste
2 15-ounce cans garbanzo beans, drained
⅓ cup tahini paste
½ cup olive oil
½ cup fresh lemon juice
1 cup water
A few dashes of kosher hot pepper sauce
½ tsp. paprika
1 tsp. cumin

Place garlic, salt, and garbanzos in food processor. Process until mixture is almost pureed. Add tahini paste and process again. With the machine running, add the olive oil, lemon juice and water in a thin stream. Scrape the sides of the container. Add the remaining ingredients and process again. Adjust the seasoning. Serve as a dip with cut vegetables and pita bread triangles.

Makes about 1 quart.

SPICY MEATBALLS

1 lb. extra lean ground beef
Or 1 pound 100 per cent white meat turkey breast
1 cup onion, chopped
1 clove garlic, chopped
¼ cup fresh parsley, chopped
1 tsp. salt
Freshly ground pepper to taste
1 tsp. dried dill

Place all ingredients in food processor. Process until well combined. Divide the meat mixture into 16 pieces. Wet your hands with cold water and shape each piece into a ball.

Spray a fry pan with a non-stick coating with a vegetable oil spray. Place the prepared meatballs in the pan. Cook over medium high heat to brown the meat, turning the meatballs frequently so they keep their shape. If you used turkey, add some water to the pan. Cook about 15 minutes, or until all the pink color is gone and all the water has evaporated. If you like the onions more well done, continue another 30 minutes in a 350-degree oven.

To serve, cut pita bread in half. Open the pocket and place 2 meatballs inside. Add baba ghanoush. Eat at once.

Makes 16 meatballs.

BABA GHANOUSH

2 large eggplants, cooked (grilled, broiled, or baked)
1 cup hummus
2 tbsp. chopped parsley

Peel the blackened skin from the eggplants. Place the eggplants in a colander and let them drain.

In a medium mixing bowl, mash the eggplant with a fork. Slowly beat in the hummus until the mixture reaches the consistency of a smooth cream. Use to fill pita sandwiches, along with spicy meatballs.

Makes 3 cups.

TABOULI

½ cup bulgar wheat
Boiling water
6 green onions
1 large bunch parsley
Several sprigs of fresh mint, if available (or 1 teaspoon dried)
3 large ripe tomatoes
Dressing:
5 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2½ tbsp. olive oil
2½ tbsp. water
Salt and pepper to taste
⅛ tsp. allspice
⅛ tsp. cinnamon

Place the bulgar wheat in a small bowl and cover with boiling water. Let stand for 30 minutes. Drain thoroughly.

In the meantime, chop all the vegetables or process them in a food processor. Don't let them get mushy. The pieces should not be too finely chopped. Place them in a large bowl. Add the drained bulgar and the dressing. Let the salad stand for several hours before serving.

Makes 8 servings.

ISRAELI-STYLE WILTED CUCUMBERS

2 large cucumbers, peeled and sliced thinly
2 tsp. salt
¼ cup chopped parsley
2 tsp. chopped dill
½ cup white vinegar
½ tsp. sugar or to taste (or sugar substitute)

Layer the cucumber slices into a large colander. Lightly salt each layer. Cover them with an 8-inch pie pan, held down by something heavy, like a bag of dried beans. This makes the cucumbers wilt. Place this over a bowl to catch the liquid. Refrigerate at least 2 hours.

Remove from the refrigerator. Rinse in cold water. Place in a bowl and toss with the remaining ingredients. Add water if the dressing doesn't cover the cucumbers. Chill at least 1 hour.

Makes 8 servings.

LENTIL SALAD

1 cup brown lentils
1 bay leaf
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. dried basil
1 clove garlic
1 cup celery, coarsely chopped
1 small red onion, chopped
Vinaigrette Dressing
Fresh mint for garnish
Fresh herbs, such as basil or dill, for garnish

Place the lentils in a large pot. Cover them completely with cold water. Add the bay leaf, salt, basil and one of the garlic cloves. Cover, bring to a boil, and reduce the heat. Simmer one-half hour. Then add the celery and onion. Continue cooking until the lentils are tender, adding additional water if necessary.

Drain the lentils. Discard the bay leaf and garlic. Season with Vinaigrette Dressing. Toss well. Let the salad stand for 2 hours before serving. Garnish with fresh mint and other fresh herbs.

Makes 8 servings.

VINAIGRETTE DRESSING

⅓ cup olive oil
⅓ cup kosher red wine vinegar
⅓ cup water
1 clove garlic, finely chopped
1 tsp. salt, or to taste
Fresh ground pepper
½ tsp. dried mustard
½ tsp. paprika
2 tbsp. fresh parsley, oregano, basil or any other herbs, in any combination, chopped

Place all ingredients in a glass jar with a lid that fits tightly. Shake well. Let stand for 1 hour before using so the flavors can blend.

Makes 1 cup.

Book profiles dancer's life

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — About 300 friends and relatives of journalist Diane Solway recently helped her launch her first book, A Dance Against Time: The Brief, Brilliant Life of a Joffrey Dancer.

Though now, after 13 years, she is a confirmed New Yorker, Solway felt more than at home, as she was surrounded by her parents, Elaine and Herb Solway, and a host of relatives who are active in the performing arts scene here and who backed her ambition to be a writer.

Her mother, now remarried, is on the board of the National Ballet of Canada school, and vice-president of the Toronto chapter, Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University. Her father, also remarried, is a senior partner of the law firm Goodman and Goodman and a former chair of the United Jewish Welfare Fund of Toronto and the Board of Jewish Education.

Among the guests were her great aunts, the renowned photographer Sylvia Schwartz and bookstore owner Ruth Schwartz, and her grandmother, Sophie Bassin, who used to take her to ballet lessons, and was chair of the UJA women's division for several years.

Diane Solway

A Dance Against Time, published in hardcover by Pocket Books, ($30), is the story of leading Joffrey ballet dancer Eddie Stierle, son of a working class Texas family, who died of AIDS at age 23, but managed to attend the premiere of a new ballet he choreographed, just three days before he died.

An editor at the publishing house asked her to do the book after she wrote a piece on Stierle for the New York Times arts review. She first turned the idea down but later relented. Solway is now doing a biography of famed dancer Rudolf Nureyev.

It is no accident that Solway, whose chiseled profile suggests she should be on stage dancing herself, was attracted to write about ballet performers after she realized she wanted to write for a living, not dance.

Her first big break came when, after graduation from the Columbia School of Journalism in New York, a piece she freelanced on the life and times of ballet corps members landed on the cover of the New York Times arts review section.

She never looked back after that, working as a staffer at M Magazine, Elle and Town and Country, besides freelancing. Her husband, David Resnicow, a New Yorker, is a fundraiser for cultural foundations. His father, Herb Resnicow, decided to become a writer at age 65, and now, at age 70, is turning out best-selling mysteries.

Though she loves New York's cultural attractions, Solway says she and her husband may move to Toronto and raise a family. "For one thing," she said, "we won't have to pay $80 an hour to play indoor tennis."

Book's success 'amazes' author

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Israeli author Nathan Shaham is amazed that his 1987 novel The Rosendorf Quartet has become a best-seller, won prestigious literary prizes and been translated into several languages including Chinese and Russian.

Shaham gave separate English and Hebrew readings from the novel recently, at the Harbourfront International Festival of Authors in Toronto.

"I never tried to have this book published abroad," said the Tel Aviv-born writer, who has lived on Kibbutz Bet Alfa, south of Lake Kinneret, for nearly 50 of his 69 years.

Set in Palestine in the mid-1930s, The Rosendorf Quartet describes the formation of a string quartet consisting of four German Jews who have emigrated to the nascent Jewish homeland. The book is narrated by each of the four in turn, as well as by a fifth character, a writer who befriends the quartet and wants to write a novel about the interrelationships of its members.

Critics have hailed the book as an "extraordinary literary fugue" and compared its author to such eminent figures as Thomas Mann, who possessed a similar preoccupation with and sensitivity to art and music.

The Rosendorf Quartet has won Israel's prestigious Bialik Prize for literature as well as the 1992 U.S. National Jewish Book Award — whose other recipients have included Saul Bellow, Isaac Bashevis Singer, Philip Roth and Cynthia Ozick. Shaham seems grateful for the attention but admits he does not like prizes.

He likewise seems somewhat indifferent to the financial rewards that come with having penned a bestseller. "Living on Bet Alfa, I never had to think about the commercial side of my writing. I was lucky that I sell very well and the kibbutz is happy about the royalties. But maybe if I didn't sell so well, I'd be uneasy to see other people working so hard around me."

Shaham, who was Israel's cultural attache in New York for three and a half years and is also the director of Sifriot Poalim Publishers, seems most interested in changing society for the better — and in writing more books. He said that he, along with Amos Oz and David Grossman and other Israeli writers, play a significant role in Israel's political development.

In a private interview before his readings, Shaham gave The CJN exclusive information about his latest project. "You're one of the few people in the world who know what I'm writing now," he said. "I'm writing about a house in Tel-Aviv that was built in 1920, and about all the people who lived in the house and what happened to them over a period of almost 80 years.

"It's a survey of 10 or more families. The common denominator is not time or a person — it's a place, the house in Tel-Aviv where I was born."

Eye on Arts

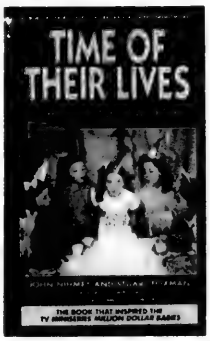
The Man Behind the Miniseries: Million Dollar Babies, a four-hour TV miniseries scheduled to air in two parts on the CBS and CBC networks this week, is based on a book co-authored by Stuart Foxman, a 33-year-old communications consultant based in Thornhill, north of Toronto.

Foxman and John Nihmey wrote Time of Their Lives: The Dionne Tragedy while the two worked at an Ottawa communications firm eight years ago. The book, which tells the story of the famous quintuplets from their parents' point of view, was written as a novel, though an authors' forward makes the claim it was based on actual events. Since it has sold more than 5,000 copies, it is considered a Canadian bestseller.

Years ago, Foxman and Nihmey sold film rights of the book to Cinar Films of Montreal, which produced Million Dollar Babies with Bernard Zukerman Productions of Toronto. The $8-million production, which stars Beau Bridges and Kate Nelligan, is the first Canadian miniseries ever to be pre-sold to a U.S. network for simultaneous airing.



Born in the northern Ontario town of Corbeil in 1934, the five Dionne sisters were the first quintuplets to survive birth. They were taken from their parents as infants, made wards of the Ontario government, and made the focal point of a diverse tourist and marketing industry that eventually reaped more than $500 million.

"Everybody else before us glossed over the fact that this family was split up by the government of Ontario," says Foxman. "Eventually there was legislation passed that established a board of guardians and effectively took the children away from their parents. We saw the story first and foremost as a family torn apart, with parents trying to regain their children."

Foxman grew up in the Montreal suburb of Dollard des Ormeaux and attended Talmud Torah and Herzliah High School. He is a member of the board of ORT, the Organization for Educational Resources and Technological Training.

This month, Seal Books of Toronto has reissued Time of Their Lives in a smart-looking paperback ($6.99) with a neon-pink cover. "A lot more people are going to see the miniseries than read the book," acknowledges Foxman, who is currently at work on another book project. "But I hope that some of them will want to read the book, too."

English-Hebrew dictionary E to G

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Good news for bibliophiles is the publication of the second volume (E-G) of a transliterated English-Hebrew dictionary by David Mendel Harduf and Eleanor Harduf.

This easy-on-the-eyes, soft-cover dictionary with wide margins and lots of white space is printed on wood free ivory linen embossed paper and was typeset in Israel.

As for the first volume, 200 copies of this 334-page edition have been printed and are available from Harduf Books, 11 Plum Treeway, Willowdale, Ont., M2R 3J1, 663-5467.

With its excellent design, its guide to abbreviations, and its pronunciation key, it well exemplifies the proverb quoted on its cover: "A word clearly spoken is like a pattern of golden apples on a silver mosaic."

The pronunciation key covers vowels and diphthongs; there is also a guide for consonants.

The dictionary entries are transliterated; that is, the Hebrew words are also written out phoneticallly in English letters to aid in pronunciation. Unlike some dictionaries, which use the full-range academic system of transliteration, Harduf's is simplified.

Schools and universities in Canada, the United States, Israel, England, Ireland, Australia, and New Zealand have ordered the dictionaries.

Books
By Bernard Baskin

Jewish Wisdom, by Rabbi Joseph Telushkin (Morrow, $39.95).

This is a splendid book. The author, a prolific writer and student of the Jewish tradition, has compiled a rich and valuable anthology that enshrines the values, wisdom and moral teachings of Judaism. It presents the ethical judgements, insights and historical lessons of yesterday as a guide to some of the vexing problems and dilemmas of our own time.

This mammoth volume of over 600 pages is a worthy sequel to the author's recent and popular Jewish Literacy.

The hundreds of brief statements, maxims, legends, parables, anecdotes and gems of sagacity are drawn from the Bible, Talmud, Midrash, Responsa and Zohar — as well as from Yiddish, chassidic and modern literature. There are also contributions from non-Jews.

The selections are organized into eight segments and 91 subdivisions, and range over the entire spiritual and historical Jewish landscape: sex, parents and children, God, Holocaust, old age, prayer, anti-Semitism, Zionism, love, marriage, divorce, honesty and speech.

What is especially noteworthy are the author's provocative and thoughtful commentaries that render the material fresh and relevant.

- Although the Talmud permitted polygamy, none of the almost 2,000 sages cited had more than one wife. One rabbi spoke of the problems that polygamy can create. "A man had two wives, a young one and an old one. The young wife pulled out his white hair and the old one pulled out his black hair. In the end, the poor man was left with no hair at all."
- Rodney Dangerfield, a contemporary comic confided: "We sleep in separate rooms, we have dinner apart, we take separate vacations — we're doing everything we can to keep our marriage together."
- Israeli buses try to encourage people to offer their seats to the elderly and the following sentences from Leviticus is posted: "You shall rise before the aged and show deference to the old. You shall fear your God."
- There is a poignant instance of poetic metaphor in the Talmud in regard to a scholar who has lost his intellectual abilities. "Show respect to an old man who has forgotten his learning through no fault of his own, for we have learned that the fragments of the old tablets were kept alongside the new tablets in the Ark of the Covenant."
- In a statement registering his profound mistrust of messiahs and messianic movements that arose during his lifetime, a first century rabbi taught, "If there is a sapling in your hand when they say to you, 'Behold, the Messiah has come!' complete planting the sapling, and then go and welcome the Messiah."
- Isaac Bashevis Singer was fond of the following story. "In the 1920s, a Jewish traveller returned from Warsaw to a small Jewish shtetl in Poland and told his friend of the wonders he had seen: 'I met a Jew who had grown up in a yeshivah and knew large sections of the Talmud by heart. I met a Jew who was an atheist. I met a Jew who owned a large clothing store with hundreds of employees and I met a Jew who was an ardent communist.' 'So what's so strange?' the friend asks. 'There must be a million Jews in Warsaw.' 'You don't understand,' the man answers. 'It was all the same Jew.' "

In a recent interview, the author said his aim was to create excitement about Jewish learning and about the centrality of ethics in Judaism. He has succeeded in a manner both illuminating and pleasurable.

Proper Planning Can Save Thousands

A major factor in getting your house to sell quickly is simply put, make it attractive. You are competing against many other properties and "showability" can make all the difference in the world.

Steps to improve each area of the home should begin long before a for sale sign is placed on your lawn. Many of these improvements can be done for little to no cost and can have a significant effect on the end result.

Shami Zimmerman of HomeLife/Partners Realty Inc. has compiled a comprehensive report "Maximizing Your House Sale Results." It is a step by step approach to getting your home ready for "Showtime."

To receive your free copy, you can call her at 416-229-4454.

Chanukah Greetings

Chanukiyot are delicious

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Chanukah guests at the Bresver home can always look forward to seeing — or tasting — an innovative chanukiah.

This year Bunni and David Bresver, along with their teenage children Alison and Adam, will host a buffet dinner for two dozen people. The centrepiece (and dessert) will be a large "chanukiah" fashioned from 61 cinnamon buns by Bunni and her mother Magda Lofsky.

After Lofsky made a double recipe of sweet yeast dough, the pair designed a free-form chanukiah using two baking sheets, one for the base, another for the top.

In years past, Bresver, a psychologist, has made decorative chanukiyot from challah or gingerbread.

Although Alison, 15, and Adam, 13, didn't work on the cinnamon buns, their creativity is evident in chanukiyot from previous years.

Both teens agree that their all-time favorite is the "peace dove," a white plasticine-and-feather creation which Adam dreamed up two years ago. It originally held a small twig in its mouth to symbolize the olive branch of peace.

"I like it because it's sort of significant," says Alison.

The Bresvers have made their own chanukiyot regularly for the past five or six years, and have kept all their creations. They also have a number of the storebought variety, enough so that each family among their guests is able to recite the blessings over its own chanukiah.

From left: Alison, David, Bunni and Adam Bresver pose in their kitchen with some of their chanukiyot. At right are two home-made "peace doves." The cinnamon-bun chanukiah takes up most of the counterspace. [Frances Kraft photo]

One Bresver chanukiah is decorative rather than functional: a silver-painted metre-high structure formed mainly from paper-towel rolls. The children and two of their friends put it together a few years ago in the Bresvers' basement, then spray-painted it in the garage. In place of candles, the family uses yellow or white tissue paper to resemble flames in each paper-towel roll opening.

At the Bresvers' synagogue, Temple Emanu-El, there is an annual chanukiah event to display the chanukiyot created by families.

On the Shabbat that falls during Chanukah, families parade around the sanctuary with their chanukiyot as part of the Friday night service, and the chanukiyot remain on display throughout Shabbat.

"We've had some extraordinary creations," says Temple Emanu-El's director of education Marlene Myerson. One year there was a chanukiah incorporating hand-sewn dolls whose costumes represented different countries in which Jews live, she recalls. Pop cans and macaroni have been among the other materials used.

"It really adds a wonderful family dimension to Chanukah preparations," says Myerson.

The (female) ties that bind

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Being a woman myself, and the mother of three daughters, it should surprise no one that I am interested in women's issues.

Of course, sometimes you have to get straight just what "women's issues" means.

Is it a women's issue how one relates to teenage children, if those children happen to be female?

I always assumed that once my children got to be teenagers, our relationship would be adult and loving, filled with mutual respect. We would have long talks, when they would confide their deepest, most serious concerns and thoughts, and I would gently pass on wisdom accumulated over the years to their ever-receptive ears.

Now, don't ask me where I got this idea of a mother-teenager relationship.

When I was a teenager, I was convinced my mother was hopelessly out-of-date about clothes, dating (not that I did much of that as a teenager, to my chagrin), current events, makeup, educational topics and a few more things I could think of if I had the time.

Like all parents, I determined that things would be different with my offspring.

That's not quite the way things have worked out.

Now let me point out my kids are terrific — they are intelligent, compassionate, committed, strong-minded, independent thinkers. And they do indeed want to confide in me.

What they don't want is advice — because I am so hopelessly out of date about, well, you name it.

In other columns, I have referred to being overwhelmed by the religious faith and certainty of my oldest daughter. Well, my younger ones are the same.

This has to be one of the most important ties that binds us to each other.

To accept in these politically correct days that our role as Jewish women is not primarily in the synagogue but rests in the home, the school and in our personal lives can be difficult.

To recognize the yoke of Judaism binds and affects us as we go about our day's activities, from making time to daven Mincha in the middle of the afternoon to bringing our own meal to an office dinner and dressing in halachically acceptable fashion, is equally difficult.

It sets us apart in a very real way from the rest of the world.

But what I like so much about my daughters is their realization that this does not make us intrinsically superior to other Jews. We are all part of the same family, bound by the same history, the same responsibility for each other, the same destiny.

The generations often differ in how they see their role as Jews. Sometimes the parents are more observant, sometimes the children are, sometimes one is alienated and the other still feels a tie.

That is exactly what happened in the years before the Maccabees rebelled, before the miracle of the oil.

Some Jews became completely assimilated into the Syrian-Greek culture. Some, as most of us try to do now, tried to balance the fine line between adherence to a Jewish lifestyle and accepting the best of the outside world. And some resolutely turned their faces away from the outside.

It was the women, according to tradition, who maintained allegience to religious practice, even at the cost of their lives. And it is still women who make (or buy) the latkes and the sufganiot, make sure that the Chanukah menorah is lit, that the family, those who observe and those who don't, those who are of one generation and those of the others, get together and sing the Chanukah songs. They recognize, above all, that the members of the family, like the members of the Jewish people as a whole, are an incredible unity.

May the warmth and beauty of the Chanukah candles light the corners of your homes and hearts this year, and every year.

Lights of Chanukah survived horrors of Bergen Belsen

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

Chanukah. Eight days and nights. The family gathers hastily around the menorah. Matches are struck, the candles lit. Haneiros Hallalu and Ma'oz Tsur chanted in joy. Then, with perhaps more haste, the group disperses, each to his or her own pursuits. The candles flicker on, lonely, but not for long. So ends the daily ritual.

I heard a story many years ago that mesmerized me. It forces me to linger after everyone has dispersed and stare at the little flames. I stare. I think. I ponder. I cry. And I pray. I pray that my soul shall once again be penetrated with the lessons of hope and faith that the story so beautifully teaches us. I pray that I shall never ever forget how to have the light of emunah, faith in HaShem, despite the darkness that often envelops us — sometimes as individuals, sometimes collectively as a nation.

Let me share the sad, but beautiful and awesome story with you.

One year in Bergen Belsen on the eve of Chanukah, a selection took place. Early in the morning three German commandants, meticulously dressed in their uniforms and in unusually high spirits, entered the men's barracks. The men were ordered to stand at the foot of their three-tiered bunk beds.

The selection began. There was no roll call, no head count. One of the commandants merely lifted his white-gloved finger and pointed in the direction of a pale face, while his mouth pronounced the death sentence with a single word: "Komme!" (Come).

The men selected were marched outside. SS men with rubber truncheons and iron prods awaited them. They kicked, beat and tortured the innocent victims. When the tortured bodies no longer responded, the revolver was used.

The random selection went on in the barracks and the brutal massacre continued outside until sundown. When the Nazi angels of death, yemach shemam vezichram, departed, they left behind heaps of twisted and tortured bodies.

Then Chanukah came to Bergen Belsen. It was time to kindle the Chanukah lights. There was no menorah, and no oil or candle. All that belonged to the past. Instead, a wooden clog, the shoe of one of the inmates, became the chanukiah; threads pulled from a concentration camp uniform, a wick; and black camp shoe polish, oil.

Not far from the bodies, the living skeletons gathered to participate in the candle lighting. Rabbi Israel Spira, the Bluzhover Rebbe, lit the first light and chanted the first two blessings in his pleasant voice, though the festive melody was filled with sorrow and pain. When he was about to recite the third blessing of the Shehechianu, he stopped, turned his head and looked around as though searching for something.

But immediately, he turned his face back to the quivering small light and in a strong, reassuring, comforting voice, chanted the third brachah: "Blessed are You, O Lord our G-d, King of the Universe, Who has kept us alive, and preserved us, and enabled us to reach this season."

Passion remained in camps

Among the people present was a Mr. Zamietchkowski, one of the leaders of the Warsaw Bund. He was a clever, sincere person with a passion for discussing matters of religion and faith. That passion had not abated in the camps. He never missed an opportunity to engage in such a conversation.

As soon as the rebbe had finished the kindling ceremony, Zamietchkowski elbowed his way to the rabbi and said, "Rabbi Spira, I know you to be a clever and an honest man. I can understand your need to light Chanukah candles in these wretched times. I can even understand the historical note of the second blessing, 'Who performed miracles for our fathers in days of old, at this season.' But the fact that you recited the third blessing is beyond me.

"How could you thank G-d and bless Him for keeping us alive and reaching this season? How can you utter those words when hundreds of dead bodies are literally lying in the shadows of the Chanukah light; when thousands of Jewish skeletons are walking around camp, and millions more being massacred? For this you are thankful to G-d? For this you praise Him? This you call 'keeping us alive'?"

"Zalmeitchknowski, you are prefectly right," responded the rebbe. "When I reached the third blessing, I also hesitated and asked myself what I should do with this brachah. I turned my head to enquire of the other distinguished rabbis who are standing near me, if indeed I might recite this brachah. But just then I noticed the throng of living Jews, their faces expressing faith and devotion, and concentration as they were listening intently to the kindling of the lights. I said to myself, if the Almighty has such a nation which at times like these, when, during the kindling of the lights, they see in front of them the corpses of their beloved fathers, brothers and sons, and death is peering at them from every corner; if despite all that they can stand in throngs listening devotedly to the Chanukah blessings; if, indeed I was blessed to see such a pure and holy nation with so much faith and fervor, then I am under an even more special obligation to receive the third brachah."

Some years after the liberation, Rabbi Spira received regards from Zamietchkowski. He told the messenger to tell Israel Spira that the answer he gave him that dark Chanukah night in Bergen Belsen had stayed with him, and was a source of inspiration to him during hard and troubled times.

In merit of the light of the Torah and mitzvot we perform in ever-growing numbers each and every year since the Holocaust, may HaShem shine down upon us His light and bounty of blessing and salvation, performing miracles in our times, as in days of old, bringing the time of the Geula shleimah (the ultimate redemption) speedily, and in our days. Amen. Happy Chanukah.

Chanukah Greetings

Chanukah is a family affair

By FRED WEINBERG
Special to The CJN

Chanukah is a fun holiday with lights and latkes, gifts and games especially for the children.

The Chanukah lights proclaim the miracle that occurred at the time of the Maccabees, recalling the victory over the Syrian Greek army of Antiochus IV in 165 BCE.

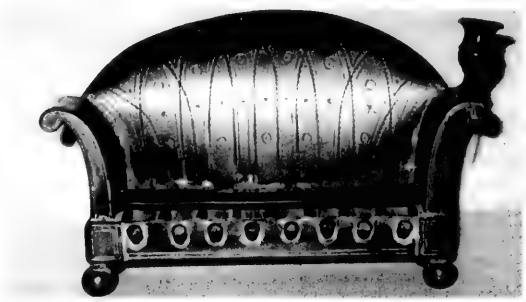
Chanukah celebrates the eight-day re-dedication ceremonies in the Temple of Jerusalem, which began on the 25th day of the Hebrew month of Kislev, and it commemorates the miracle in which the single remaining pure and sealed flask of oil (a one-day supply) burned for an entire eight days.

Potato latkes fried in oil are the traditional dish, a reminder of the miracle.

The whole family is involved in the celebration including the children, particularly in lighting the chanukiah starting with one light on the first night and concluding with eight for the last day.

The design of the chanukiah and its composition varied through the ages and was determined by the artistic style of the country where the Jews lived at a given time. And chanukiahs are found to be made from many materials, from early stone or earthenware to the more modern brass or silver.

Gifts are given traditionally only to children during Chanukah and consist of Chanukah gelt (coins), probably for use in the dreidel and other games. However, because of the strong environmental influences in North America, a general exchange of presents takes place among many families. The intention is for Jewish children not to feel deprived in relation to their friends and neighbors during the gift-giving and festivities of the season.



Bench type Chanukah menorah of pewter from Bohemia 1840. It is an exact copy of a Biedermeier style of sofa. The "bench" lifts to reveal the oil containers. Wicks would go into the spouts and the candle holder on the right for the Shamash. [From the collection of Fred Weinberg]

In central Europe the long winter nights were considered fit only for Torah study. On Chanukah however, fun and games were allowed and the most popular, especially with children, was the dreidel, a game with a top of carved wood or lead with the Hebrew letters nun, gimel, hey, and shin on the four surfaces, standing for nes gadol hayah sham — a great miracle occurred there. According to the way the top falls after being spun, the spinner wins all or half of the stakes, or must make an additional contribution.

Toronto currently has an important collection of close to 50 Chanukah lamps on display at the Beth Tzedec congregation, part of the legacy of antique Judaica acquired from the renowned Jewish historian Dr. Cecil Roth, whose practice it was to add at least one Chanukah menorah to his collection every year.

Most of the lamps in the collection have a back panel and are made of various metals: brass, copper, silver or pewter. The motifs vary with the country of origin. The lamps were originally hung outside the house, but for security reasons, they eventually evolved into a bench type that sat on the windowsill or on the table inside the Jewish home.

Early Polish or Russian Chanukah lamps are rare because of the many massacres that were prepetrated against Eastern European Jewry, with their loss of life and destruction of possessions. However, in Italy and other Western European countries there are examples of 16th century memorahs. One in the Roth collection bears the coat of arms of a cardinal of the Roman Catholic Church in thanks for favors to the Italian Jewish community.

In Israel, large electric Chanukah menorahs are kindled on top of major public buildings and high places such as Mount Zion.

Essentially though, Chanukah remains very much a children's celebration and hence the traditional Yiddish song:

Chanukah Chanukah
A yom tov a shainer
A lichtiger a frailicher
Nit do nach a zainer.

Syrian Jewry: Bravery in the past...

By MICHAEL A. ZIMMERMAN
Special to The CJN

Chanukah celebrates a spiritual victory that took place in Israel nearly 2,200 years ago, one that has inspired generations of Jews and gentiles.

A few faithful Jews were victorious over their assimilationist brethren and over the Hellenist Syrians of the Greek-founded Seleucid Empire.

The guerilla war, fought initially for religious freedom and later for national liberation, erupted after the Seleucids forbade the observances of Judaism, defiled the Holy Temple in Jerusalem, desecrated the Sabbath and burned Torah scrolls. Jews were forced to worship idols and eat forbidden foods or be tortured to death.

The object of the Hellenist Syrian Seleucids was not religious conversion but rather the utter suppression of Judaism. The Temple, symbolic centre of the Jewish nation and focus of the people, was turned into "the abomination of desolation" (I Maccabees 1:54). Pagan rites involving prostitution were carried out within the sacred enclosures.

Jews were outraged and roused to action.

The freeing of Jerusalem and the cleansing and rededication of the Temple were the primary goals of the Jews in their war of liberation. The central motif of Chanukah today is celebration of the inspiring political-military victory, after four years of warfare, in which Jerusalem's heart, the Holy Temple, was liberated and reconsecrated.

The leaders of the uprising are referred to as both Maccabees and Hasmoneans. The word maccabee comes from the Hebrew makevet (hammer). It was initially applied to Judah, the war's first leader, and then to all five fighting Hasmonean brothers: Judah, Eleazer, Jochanan, Jonathan and Simeon. Maccabee is also an acronym of the Hebrew battle cry: Who is like Thee among the powers, O Lord?

In the strategic sense, the Seleucids sought a quick decision while the Maccabees wanted a protracted campaign to tire the invader. Tactically the Seleucids preferred slow action because of their superiority in formation combat, while the Jews preferred fast action to utilize tactical skill, knowledge of terrain, intelligence from local villagers and use of surprise.

Military discipline

Compared to most irregulars in history, the Hasmoneans displayed exemplary military discipline and unity of action in tactics and strategy.

The forces available to the Hasmoneans were small. At the beginning, they had no long-term plan, military training or weapons. In the first battles, they benefitted by capturing weapons.

That the Hasmoneans chose the way of freedom was against logical odds, and that they did so out of devotion to religious values serves as an example to us all.

The bravery of the two brothers Judah and Eleazer is legendary. In one battle, at Beth Horon, Judah pursued and slew the Syrian commander, Seron, in personal combat and thereafter used his golden sword in battle.

An address to his troops by Judah, as recorded in I Maccabees 3:18-22, epitomizes the attitude and belief of the zealot warrior: "Victory in war does not depend upon the size of the force, but strength comes from heaven. They will come against us full of violence and lawlessness, to destroy us and our wives and children, and to plunder us, but we are fighting for our lives and our laws. He Himself [God] will crush them before us, and you must not be afraid of them."

In modern Israel, Chanukah symbolizes the victory of the few over the many and the courage of Jews to assert themselves as a people. Each year a marathon torch relay race sets out from Modi'in, where the Maccabean revolt broke out. Runners carry the torch to Jerusalem where the president of Israel lights the Chanukah lights with the flame from Modi'in.

The Jewish religion was tried, tempered and strengthened by its fierce encounter with the despotic Seleucid Empire of Hellenized Syrians 22 centuries ago. The Maccabees aroused Judaism, strengthened it and prepared the Jewish people for the ordeals to come against the Romans and in exile; and for the rebirth in our own time.

Author Michael A. Zimmerman, a Chicago-area management consultant and speaker, worked as a political analyst in Israel.

CJN Israel Correspondent

In 1987 Lalum Murad tried to escape from Syria. The Jewish tailor from Damascus was caught slipping across the Turkish border. He spent the next nine months in prison, five of them in solitary confinement.

In 1990, Moshe Araz, a Jewish entrepreneur from Damascus, went on a business trip to Turkey. There he telephoned relatives in Israel and learned that his sister was to be married in Tel Aviv that very evening.

"Please come to the wedding," his mother pleaded. But Araz did not go. He could not forget the words of the Syrian officer upon his departure from Damascus.

"If you go anywhere else but Turkey," he warned, "we'll find you and we'll kill you."

Today Araz and Murad work side by side in a small factory in Tel Aviv. They are among some 1,300 Syrian Jews who have been brought to Israel over the last two years in a secret operation that culminated last month with the arrival of the community's Chief Rabbi Avraham Hamra.

They are part of an exodus of 3,800 Jews — virtually the entire Syrian Jewish population — that began in April 1992 when Syrian President Hafez al-Assad started granting exit permits to Jews, stipulating that they could use them to travel anywhere but Israel.

The majority went to the United States. Those who wanted to go to Israel waited until their relatives had left Syria so as not to endanger them. Today 230 Jews remain in Damascus, all with permits to leave.

With their families safely out of Syria, many of the new immigrants talk openly for the first time about their former lives.

"The hardest thing about being a Jew in Syria was having to keep your mouth shut no matter what they said to you," recounts 40-year-old Jida Shkefaty. "If people told you, 'all the Jews should be killed,' you couldn't say anything. You had to keep quiet. For 40 years I kept quiet. After awhile it makes you sick inside."

Shkefaty tried to escape when he was 17. But he lost his way. The beating he got by the Syrian police left him deaf in one ear.

Murad recalls the months he spent in solitary confinement after his family's aborted escape bid. "I couldn't tell day from night. I was in a cell 50 metres underground. The guards beat me and gave me electric shocks."

Painful decision

Murad's wife and elderly parents were also jailed. "My father's health has never been the same," he says.

Araz recalls the painful decision to miss his sister's wedding in Tel Aviv in 1987. "My mother begged me to come. I could have flown from Turkey to Israel in just over an hour. But my wife and children were in Syria. I was afraid to endanger them."

For Jews who did not try to escape, life in Syria was relatively tolerable — some even say "good" — for the last 20 years since Assad came to power. Jews were able to travel abroad as long as they did not go to Israel, and as long as they left family members behind.

"There was a marked improvement in 1975," says Dr. Fouad Baghdadi, who had a thriving medical practice in Damascus. "We were able to make a good living, and travelled abroad often. I remember the climate of hatred and fear that reigned during my childhood. When Israel became a state in 1948, I was terrified. There was violence and rioting in Damascus. But for the last 20 years life in Syria has been very good for Jews."

"We had no special problems," concurs Dr. Moshe Suad. "We travelled to Europe and the U.S. We took holidays on the beach. I had two homes and two private medical clinics."

If in Syria many Jews led affluent lives, in Israel they are struggling to get by.

Baghdadi, who ran the medical clinic in the Jewish quarter of Damascus, is still looking for work after a year in Israel. "It's a hard beginning," he says.

After 15 months in the country, Suad has found a half-time position in a local medical clinic. "It's not easy to support a wife and five children on a part-time salary," he says.

Most immigrants have bought their own apartments, supplementing a government mortgage with their own savings . They have congregated mainly in two neighborhoods south of Tel Aviv: Bat Yam, which already boasts several Syrian synagogues; and Holon, which has a mayor of Syrian Jewish origin. (Mayor Motti Sasson's father, Shlomo Sasson, was the leader of the Aleppo Jewish community in the 1940s.)

Israel: a dream, a disappointment

[Cont'd. from page B5]

In the last two years, nearly 600 immigrants from Syria have settled in Holon, including, most recently, former Chief Rabbi Hamra and his family.

"Living together gives us the sense of community that we had in the Jewish quarter of Damascus," says Araz, a Holon resident.

For many, being in Israel is both the realization of a lifelong dream — and a disappointment.

"Since childhood I dreamed of coming to Eretz Israel," says Suad. "But I never knew how hard it would be."

The sharp drop in the standard of living and the difficulty of finding work have tempered the initial excitement of arriving in Israel.

"Sometimes my children ask me why we left Syria," says Suad. "They don't know how bad life used to be for a Jew in Syria. I decided to leave while we had the chance. The government could change. If the Muslim Brotherhood comes to power, Syria could become another Iran."

And as good as life was in recent years, Suad admits that there was always tension beneath the surface.

Baghdadi thinks the sacrifices he is making to live in Israel are worth it. "The truth is that I personally had a better life in Syria," he says.

"But my children will have a better future in Israel. All my life I felt as though I didn't belong in Syria, as though I was a stranger, an enemy. I never want my children to experience that feeling. Here in Israel they will feel they belong. They will be equal citizens in their own country."

"We had a good life in Syria," says Araz. "But we'll make a better life here. This is our country."

REKINDLING THE SPIRIT

Despite centuries of persecution, the Jews of Ethiopia succeeded in asserting and defending their Jewish values. At the same time they were unaware of the existence of the festival of Chanukah and its significance to the Jewish people. Each Chanukah, Ethiopian children in schools learn how to celebrate this festival of lights, which symbolizes the struggle to preserve the Jewish faith. [WZPS photo]

Israeli artist creates striking Chanukah menorah for contest

Following a world-wide call for entries to its competition for exceptional designs for a Chanukah menorah (chanukiah), Spertus Institute of Jewish Studies chose Israeli artist, Janet Berg as the winner of the first international biennial Philip and Sylvia Spertus Judaica Prize for Jewish ceremonial art. The $10,000 first prize is the world's largest award for Judaic art.

The winner was chosen from some 200 submissions from around the world, including the United States, Canada, South America, Europe and Israel. An exhibition displaying the winner and 25 finalists opened Sunday, Oct. 2 and will be on until the end of February 1995 at the Spertus Museum in Chicago.

"The Spertus Prize was designed to stimulate debate about the criteria for making quality ceremonial Judaic art and to foster greater appreciation for all Judaic art forms," says Spertus Museum director Dr. Morris Fred.

"The winner of this inaugural prize meets our highest expectations," adds curator Olga Weiss. "It is a very intricate and unusual piece. In addition to its artistry, the menorah, in its form, closely adheres to Jewish ritual requirements."

Berg's cylindrical glass and metal design was determined the winner by a notable panel of judges, including: Evelyn M. Cohen, professor of art history, Stern College, Yeshiva University; Tom L. Freudenheim, assistant secretary for museums, Smithsonian Institution and chair, National Foundation for Jewish Culture; Joseph Gutmann, professor emeritus of art history, Wayne State University, Detroit; and Richard Hunt, Chicago sculptor.

Judges chose the winner based on both esthetic and utilitarian criteria. Berg's striking and original design is representative of the miracle of the Temple menorah, holding vials of oil that burn continuously for eight days.

"This chanukiah serves as a vehicle which allows us to participate in the past," says a statement by the artist. "Perhaps the most significent contribution of this chanukiah," adds Berg, "is that it allows us to recreate the miracle; if not extinguished by us, it will burn for eight days. Every element in it serves to bring us new knowledge which deepens our understanding of the Chanukah ritual, the Chanukah story, and consequently, of Judaism itself."

Berg is a self-taught goldsmith, who mixes lost techniques from turn-of-the-century jewelers' manuals and medieval and ancient manuscripts with state-of-the-art developments in gold technology, to realize the metal's artistic potential. Berg has taught at Israel's Bezalel Academy of Art and Design. She works out of her private studio in Jerusalem.

In addition to Berg, four entries were chosen by the jury to receive honorable mention awards: Bella Feldman, Berkeley, California; Naomi Glassman and Zohar Jolles, Upper Galilee, Israel; Einat Leader Goss, Jerusalem, Israel; and Mark Weisbeck, Buffalo, New York. Each honorable mention is awarded $1,000.

Next prize to be given Passover 1996

The Chanukah menorah has a place in Jewish history dating back to 165 BCE, when the Maccabees defeated the Syrians who had defiled the Temple; they found enough oil for the Temple menorah to last only one day, but the oil burned for eight.

Underwritten by Philip and Sylvia Spertus, and sponsored by the Spertus Museum of the Spertus Institute of Jewish Studies, the next Spertus Judaica Prize will be given in 1996 and will feature Passover seder plates.

Spertus Institute of Jewish Studies is a centre for learning and culture whose mission is to preserve and disseminate the intellectual, cultural, social and spiritual legacy of the Jewish past and demonstrate its continuing relevance to the present.

All programs offered through Spertus College, Asher Library and Spertus Museum are dedicated to fulfilling this purpose.

Spertus Museum is located at 618 South Michigan Avenue, Chicago. For more information call (312) 322-1747.

CHILDREN LOVE

By LINDA ANDER
Special to The CJN

Welcome to CJNews for Kids. This is the first holiday column and it is just for YOU to enjoy! Keep your copy on the refrigerator, and use it to get ready for Chanukah.

Chanukah Facts

1/ In 175 BCE, that's over 2,000 years ago, Antiochus Epiphanes, the cruel King of Syria, tried to stop the Jews from learning Torah. He wanted the Jews to bow down to Greek statues called idols.

2/ There was a brave woman named Hannah, who stood before Antiochus, and refused to bow down to his statues. She watched as one by one her sons were killed for not bowing down either. She died of grief after her last son was killed. The rabbis say her soul went straight to Heaven.

3/ When Mattathias got angry at the soldiers, he pulled down the idols, and he cried, "Whoever is for the Lord, follow me." The initials for the Hebrew words for this form Maccabee.

4/ One the 25th day of Kislev, 165 BCE, the Maccabees found only a small pitcher of holy oil in the ruins of the temple. You know that the wick burned brightly for eight days, and so we celebrate this wonderful holiday of faith, hope and freedom, for eight days.

5/ We eat latkes because they are fried in oil which reminds us of the cruse or jar of oil that lasted for eight days. I bet you eat latkes because they taste good!

6/ The candles are shown off in your window so everyone who passes by can learn about the great miracle of Chanukah. The Chanukah light was not to be used for any regular use such as reading, but the shammash was added in case someone needed the light for normal use.

7/ A candle is put in its holder on the right side of the menorah, and lit by the shammash. A candle is added each night from right to left, and lit by the shammash, from left to right.

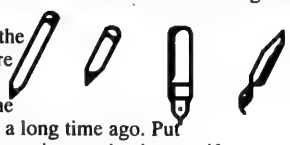
8/ When the Jewish people were studying Torah, they had someone watch out for Antiochus's soldiers. The lookout shouted a warming, and the students would play their games and spin the dreidel until the soldiers went away. Look for the letters nun, gimel, hay and shin on your dreidel. They stand for Nes Gadol Hayah Sham or A Great Miracle Happened There.

Arts & Crafts

You need imagination, things you find around the house, and also an adult to supervise some of these projects.

1) Get a potato and an apple and carefully with a plastic knife cut a design into them. Dip the apple and potato in paint and you'll make beautiful cards to give as presents, or decorations for your window.

2) Design a banner for your window showing the Chanukah story. Can you find things that are around the house to add on to the banner?



3) Make your own coins out of clay and use the Chanukah symbols just like the Maccabees did a long time ago. Put a hole in the coin before it dries and hand it on a string or give it as a gift.

4) You can make a chanukiah with a piece of wood and some screws. Ask a parent to help you glue the screws onto the wood.

5) Choose your favorite Chanukah characters and make paper maché puppets, paper bag puppets, or finger puppets using washable markers on your fingers, or an old glove or stocking. You can ask a friend to join you as you let your puppets act out the story of Chanukah.

Tasty Treats

You've got the decorations, you know the story, but you need some good food to make it a perfect holiday.

POTATO LATKES
6 medium potatoes
1 onion
1/4 cup of matzah meal
2 eggs
a pinch of salt and pepper approx. 1/4 cup of oil for frying
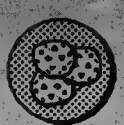
With adult supervision, you grate by hand or in a food processor the potatoes and onion. Add everything except the oil and mix it well. Heat the oil in a frying pan. When it is hot then add a spoonful of the mixture.
You'll know it is ready when it is crispy and when the smell brings your family into the kitchen asking for just one latke!

GREAT COOKIES
1 cup of butter or margarine
1 1/2 cups of sugar
1 tsp vanilla
1 tsp orange extract
3 eggs
3 3/4 cups flour
2 tsp baking powder
3/4 tsp baking soda



Mix the ingredients adding a few drops of food coloring. Roll out the batter and then use cookie cutters in the shape of dreidels or chanukiahs. Bake your cookie shapes for 7-9 minutes at 350 degrees and then enjoy!

Have a Happy Chanukah!

The next children's column will come out at Pesach. If you'd like to send me a short story, poem, joke, or word search, mail it to Linda Ander, care of CJNews for Kids, 10 Gateway Blvd. Suite 420, Don Mills, Ont.
